I have not yet heard any good reason for the insertion of this new feature into our legislation. These appropriations are for the support of the Navy for the present fiscal year, ending June 30, 1874. It is morally certain this Congress will be in session during all that time, and if any emergency should arise it is easy to make application to Congress. I can see no contingency whatever which can make it necessary for us to take this departure from what has come to be a well-understood system of administering appropriations, and which experience has shown to be necessary in reference to the details of each Bureau.

Mr. GARFIELD. As I have already stated, the committee were unwilling to report a bill appropriating $4,000,000 in a lump, and therefore asked the Secretary of the Navy to make the best estimate he could as to what distribution should be made under payments already made by the Department, and for work which had already been contracted to be done in view of the emergency which had arisen. He said he could not do it accurately, but would approximately. The appropriations in the bill have been made in detail in accordance with his estimate, and a provision has been added allowing him, whenever the President shall so order, upon some immediate emergency, to transfer funds from one branch of the service to another. For instance, there may be a sudden call for increased expenditure for ordnance and ammunition; and to meet such a contingency this provision has been incorporated into the bill; but we have guarded it so that such transfer shall be only on the special order of the President.

Mr. MAYNARD. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Ohio there cannot arise by any possibility any emergency, in the proper legal acceptation of the term, when the law-making power could not be instantly invoked. I submit my motion is more in unison with past legislation than to incorporate in this bill the words I have proposed to strike out.

Mr. GARFIELD. I agree with the gentleman. The course suggested by him under ordinary circumstances is the safer and the more prudent one to take; but it must be remembered that Congress will take a vacation during the holidays, perhaps for two weeks; and during that time troubles may arise which may urgently call for the exercise of this power on the part of the President. We have thrown all the proper safeguards about it, while at the same time making it possible for the President to discharge whatever duties may be imposed upon him by any emergency which may occur.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will not press my motion to strike out; but I regret to hear the admission made by the gentleman that during the coming holidays Congress will not be in a condition to answer the calls which may be made upon it in case of an emergency. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] by striking out the last word, for the purpose of making an observation. I understood the chairman of the committee to say, in response to a remark of mine in the early part of the debate, that none of this appropriation was to be used, except to carry out contracts already entered into by the Secretary of the Navy; in other words, that none of it was made in anticipation of any emergency; that in the emergency that has already occurred the Secretary of the Navy had made large expenditures, and had also entered into large contracts, which were now being carried out. Now, I suppose it may happen that, in carrying out those contracts, the cost of some of our Bureaus may be more than provided for in this bill. But in that case it can be provided for afterward by a deficiency bill. It seems to me the objection to this appropriation is not only the objection stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] when he raised the point of order, but there is a particular objection that it makes the bill appear to be different from what it is. It makes it look as though we were putting into the hands of the Secretary of the Navy, and of the President, $4,000,000 to be used in their discretion in case of war or if an emergency should arise, when in fact we are only putting it into their hands to pay expenses already incurred or already contracted for. If the clause were worded so that appropriations for contracts already entered into or expenditures already incurred might, if necessary, be transferred, &c., I would have no objection. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I renew the amendment simply for the purpose of stating that, while I am willing to meet every exigency for which the chairman of the committee shall feel under any necessity to ask the House for an appropriation, yet, if he can feel that there is no present necessity for retaining that provision in his bill, I should be glad to have it stricken out. It creates a bad precedent, which will soon grow up to trouble him amazingly. Nothing in the world can justify it but an absolute necessity. I suggest this to the judgment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] However, if the necessity exists, the clause can be put in no better language that I know of than the language used in the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say, in response to what has been suggested by several gentlemen, that we have inserted that clause in order that we may not cripple the Department by a wrong distribution of what they satisfied us they really need. I have no objection to adopting the language suggested by the gentleman from Vermont, so as to provide that this shall be merely to meet the present special emergency.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move, in amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, to strike out the word "emergency" and insert the words "necessity, to pay expenses already incurred and contracted for;" so that the clause will read:

And the appropriations herein made may be, in case of necessity, to pay expenses already incurred and contracted for, transferred from one Bureau to another, by special order of the President, &c.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no authority from the committee to accept that amendment, but I am willing to vote for it if it is offered.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that the making of these amendments does not cut off the right which I reserved of making a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that, having yielded to an amendment, it is now too late for him to raise a point of order.

The question was next on Mr. BECK's amendment as amended; and, being taken, it was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. TYNER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 481) making appropriations for extraordinary expenses of the naval service, had made certain amendments thereto, and had instructed him to report the same to the House with the amendments.

The SPEAKER. Are separate votes asked on the amendments? If not, they will be considered as concurred in.

No separate vote was asked, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now call the previous question on the bill as amended.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. DAWES, (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BEGOLE: Thirteen petitions, from as many towns in Oakland County, Michigan, containing the names of 885 petitioners, asking Congress to re-enact the thirty-fifth section of the act of March 3,

By Mr. HOOPER: The petition of John T. Brown and others, survivors of the war of 1812, for an increase of their pensions.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of the Holston Conference, State of Virginia, praying for the relief of the Southern Methodist publishing house.

By Mr. KELLOGG: The petition of Ferdinand Gregorie, for relief, with accompanying papers.

Also, the petition of Ferdinand Gregorie, for relief, with accompanying papers.

Also, the petition of Samuel Willette, president, and R. W. Underhill, secretary of a meeting of the Society of Friends, and others, for the appointment of a committee of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic.

By Mr. LAMPORT: The petition of S. D. Hastings, Worthy Grand Templar, and W. S. Williams, secretary of the Independent Order of Good Templars of the United States, representing 35,000 members, asking for same committee of inquiry.

By Mr. NESMITH: Three petitions from citizens of Oregon, asking relief of Southern Methodist book publishing house.

By Mr. RANDALL: The petition of Catharine Kniclem, widow of Paul Kniclem, late a sergeant of Company C, Ninety-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, asking a pension.

By Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana: The petition of Abel M. Lewis, of the State of Indiana, for relief.

By Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio: The petition of Benjamin P. Buckner, a citizen of the State of Texas.

By Mr. SENER: The petition of C. W. C. Dunnington, of Virginia, praying compensation as superintendent of gas at the Capitol from 1851 to 1861.

By Mr. SOUTHARD: The memorial of P. A. Harris, C. P. Warner, and 39 other citizens of Saint Louisville, Licking County, Ohio, praying that the postal-code be so amended that all mail-matter may be prepaid at the office of mailing, and that some more equitable and less intricate system of determining postmasters' salaries be devised.

Also, the memorial of S. C. Mendenhall, T. J. Patterson, and 91 other citizens of Frozeysburgh, Muskingum County, Ohio, praying that the postal-code may be so amended that all mail-matter may be prepaid at the office of mailing, and that some more equitable and less intricate system of determining postmasters' salaries be devised.

Also, the petition of National Temperance Society, Hon. W. E. Dodge, president, Y. N. Stearns, secretary, and T. T. Sheffield, treasurer, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Under the rule, leave was given to withdraw papers from the files of the House, for reference to the appropriate committees, as follows:

Mr. FORT, the memorial of Robert F. Winslow, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. NEGLEY. The papers in the case of Lieutenant-Colonel John G. Parr, late of the One hundred and thirty-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteers, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 15, 1873.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 482) to correct the enrollment of an act entitled "An act for the relief of P. W. Standefer;"

A bill (H. R. No. 483) to authorize the cancellation of the export bond for a portion of the distilled spirits of John S. Miller, on board of bonded cars of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 481) making appropriations for extraordinary expenses of the naval service.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 130) to remove the disabilities of Thomas S. Bocock, E. J. Harvie, and Daniel Trigg, of Virginia, and John H. Reagan, of Texas.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 470) relating to the limitation of steam-pressure of vessels used exclusively for towing and carrying freight on the Mississippi River and its tributaries; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I ask to be excused from serving upon the Committee on Pensions, on account of ill health.

The question being put, the honorable Senator was excused.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I now move that the President pro tempore be authorized to fill the vacancy on the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of William Mason, of Taunton, Massachusetts, praying compensation for the abrogation of his contract to manufacture one hundred thousand muskets of the Springfield pattern; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Julius A. Pickering, praying an extension of his patent, No. 23532, for attaching boot-straps; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the petition of upward of 1,000 citizens of Pennsylvania, principally of Philadelphia, in which, after referring to the successful issue of the Geneva court of arbitration as satisfactorily demonstrating that international difficulties may be amicably, honorably, and efficiently settled by such sensibly quiet means as were employed in that connection, they ask that Congress shall take steps to provide, in co-operation with other governments, for the settlement of international difficulties by a system of arbitration. This petition, as I understand it, is in response to a resolution which, it will be remembered, was adopted by the House of Commons during its last session, and which during the present session of the Italian Parliament has found equal favor there. I move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present the petition of John James Flournoy, of Georgia, a deaf-mute. Accompanying this petition is a letter in which the petitioner specially asks me to lay it before the Senate, hoping that it may be read or printed. With the permission of the Senate I will simply read the prayer, which relates to our pending relations with Spain:

> Hoping that your honorable body will, by the exercise of wisdom and sagacity, so order things to a happy settlement, and at the same time admonish Americans to stay at home and reform and improve social and political relations, your petitioner will most humbly pray your auspices.

I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the petition of a large number of colored citizens of Detroit, Michigan, in which they set forth the indignities to which they are exposed, and ask the passage of Senate bill No. 1, on civil rights. I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the petition of a large number of citizens of Templeton, Massachusetts, in which they set forth the hardships to which they are exposed from the existing post-office laws regulating newspapers; and they ask to have a remedy. The petition is somewhat lengthy, and I call the attention of my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to it. I move its reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHURZ presented the petition of John Bte. Hortiz, praying that he be allowed a pension for services rendered in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CROZIER presented two petitions of citizens of Kansas, praying for the establishment of a new land district in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of Mary D. Lord, mother of Joseph R. Newman, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of J. Snowden & Son, praying for the passage of an enabling act permitting them to sue in the Court of Claims to recover losses on their contract for building the monitors Manayunk and Umpqua; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SCOTT. I have had placed in my hands petitions coming from thirty-seven States and one Territory, and two hundred and seventy-five cities and towns in those States and Territory, and signed by 3,109 persons, all of whom complain of the hardships imposed upon them by the construction placed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue upon the act of 1866, section 13, by which he extends the provisions of the stamp act beyond what was required by the exigencies of the country at the time of its enactment, and, as they believe, in violation of the intention of the act. They ask for the repeal of the act. I present the petitions, and move their reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER presented two memorials of citizens of Michigan, praying for legislation to carry into effect the financial plan proposed by Senator FERRY, of that State; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONOVER presented the memorial of Commodore Edward Middleton, United States Navy, praying to be advanced to his proper grade on the retired list; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of J. H. Stine, guardian of the minor children of Joseph Jenkins, deceased, praying for arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRATT. I also present the memorial of Mary Durang, widow of Charles Durang, a soldier of the war of 1812. She states that the vicissitudes of the war procrastinated her marriage until the year 1816, and that she is excluded from a pension by the general law; and she asks for the passage of a special act granting her a pension. I move the reference of her petition to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Captain William W Low, of the United States Navy, praying to be allowed and paid the difference between the pay of a master in the line of promotion in the Navy and that of a lieutenant, from September 14, 1855, to January 16, 1858; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of George Smith, late of Company G, First Regiment New York Volunteers, praying to be allowed a bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented the petition of Mrs. Mary A. Holmes, of Columbia, South Carolina, asking to be compensated for fifty bales of cotton taken from her, after the war was over, by United States troops; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Willard Davis, late collector of internal revenue, second district of Kentucky, praying compensation for clerk hire, attorneys' fees, furniture, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the memorial of William B. Isaacs & Co., of Richmond, Virginia, praying that certain coin covered into the Treasury be returned to the owner; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LOGAN. I present a petition signed, as I am informed—I have not counted the names myself—by 3,000 citizens of the Territory of Utah. I will read one portion of it. Speaking of the condition of the country there, they say:

> Under these circumstances, the administration of the law in Utah is at a dead stand-still, and crimes go unpunished. The large and material interests now rapidly growing and expanding are substantially without the protection of law. Life and property are held at the mercy of this inimical and secret organization, rather than under the protection of civil government and wholesome laws, as we have a right to demand.
> Your memorialists therefore pray that your honorable body do pass such laws as may be necessary to correct these evils and abuses and give us the protection of free civil government, and at the same time bring the Territory of Utah into harmony with the Federal Government and republican institutions.

I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. It will be remembered that a few days since I was intrusted with the duty of presenting the petition of Arch. H. Stuart and some 100 other officers and soldiers in favor of the equalization of bounties, &c. I am now commissioned by the same gentlemen to present the petition of 250 officers and soldiers of the Soldiers' Home, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on the same subject, and I move its reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a petition signed very numerously by citizens of the State of New York, colored men, some of whom I know, and know to be respectable citizens, praying the passage of a civil-rights bill by Congress. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the petition of Moses Taylor & Co. and other ship-owners and cargo-owners of the city of New York, touching the Geneva award. They set forth that during the rebellion they were engaged in commerce upon the high seas; and that while so engaged, confederate cruisers other than the Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah (after she left Melbourne) captured and destroyed their property, (vessels and cargoes,) on which they had no insurance, and they insist that they are entitled to participate in a division of the award. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of Henry Lull, praying an extension of his patent for a shutter-hinge; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. WINDOM presented the petition of Basil Moreland, praying compensation for land and improvements of which he was deprived by virtue of a treaty with the Winnebago Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the petition of Mrs. Rosa Vertner Jeffrey, of Lexington, Kentucky, praying an allowance for rent, repairs, and damage to her house and furniture occupied as headquarters by several commanding generals during the recent rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Chief Clerk of the War Department, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of December 4, 1873, information in relation to the sale of Government property at Harper's Ferry, West Virginia; which was, on motion of Mr. DAVIS, ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. STEVENSON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of J. Milton Best be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That Patrick Sullivan have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of the administrator of Mrs. Sarah A. R. Lord be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Mary E. Purnell be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. COOPER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of James and Emma Cameron be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. COOPER, it was Ordered, That the memorial and accompanying papers of Nancy J. Turk, of Tennessee, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Rosenbaum & Co., praying to be reimbursed the cost of tax-stamps on certain tobacco burned at sea, submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. MORTON, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report, which was read:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of P. B. S. Pinchback and General McMillen for a seat in this body from the State of Louisiana, beg leave to report that they are evenly divided upon the question as to whether Mr. Pinchback is, upon his credentials, entitled to be sworn in as a member of this body; and beg leave to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and to refer the whole matter to the determination of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 167) to provide for the further endowment and support of national colleges for the advancement of general, scientific, and industrial education, and to establish an educational fund, and apply the proceeds of a portion of the public lands to the support of public education; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire simply to say that this bill is not designed to divert any funds from the Treasury Department for the coming year. It is a modification of the bill introduced last year and passed by the Senate, and also passed by the House, but not in precisely the same phraseology, modifying the mode and manner of distribution, and the amount, so as to meet some objections then made; and it also combines the subject of national colleges with public education. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONOVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 168) authorizing the Secretary of War to convey certain land, known as the Fort Brooke military reservation, to the trustees of the Florida Agricultural College; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCHURZ asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 169) for the relief of Marcus Otterbourg, late consul of the United States at the city of Mexico and minister to the Republic of Mexico; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 170) for the relief of certain officers of the Navy who were dropped, furloughed, or retired under the act of February 28, 1855; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 171) for the benefit of the legatees of Asbury Dickins, deceased; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose, as this is a claim arising out of services in the Senate, that the bill should go to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I wish to state that it is a claim on behalf of an old and faithful servant of this body for many years, who died very poor, leaving daughters dependent upon their own exertions and upon the very scanty patrimony he left them. Although that may not be any reason to show the justice of the claim, I think it is one for its speedy consideration; and I hope the Committee on Contingent Expenses will find time to attend to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to that committee.

Mr. PRATT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 172) granting a pension to Michael McGrayel, late a captain of Company E, Ninety-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 173) for the relief of Willard Davis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 174) for the relief of certain settlers upon homestead and pre-emption lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 175) relating to leave of absence granted to diplomatic and consular officers of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 176) to promote the establishment of public marine schools; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 177) relating to the public lands in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 178) to provide for the construction of the Fort Saint Philip Canal and its maintenance as a national highway; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, and ordered to be printed

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 179) for the relief of the heirs of Robert Isherwood, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAYTON. At the request of a citizen of Arkansas, and without committing myself to the measure, I ask leave to introduce a bill.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 180) to repeal section 6 of the act of March 3, 1865, and section 2 of the act of March 26, 1867, imposing a tax of 10 per cent. upon circulation of bank notes; and it was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 181) for the relief of William S. White, of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCOTT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 182) to disapprove an act of the territorial legislature of Dakota, approved May 2, 1862, entitled "An act to provide for proceedings for the collection of demands against boats and vessels;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 183) to provide for a survey and estimate of cost for constructing locks and canals to remove obstructions to the navigation of the Columbia River, in the State of Oregon and Washington Territory; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 184) relating to certain brevet appointments; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 185) for the relief of M. S. Hellman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 186) for the relief of Basil Moreland, of Mankato, Minnesota; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 187) for the relief of Silas H. Hodges; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 188) to authorize the issue of patents to lands in cases of private land claims; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I wish to say that this bill was sent me by a citizen of the State of New York. It seems to be right upon its face. I do not vouch for it, however. I move its reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know whether there is anything in that bill that makes it peculiarly a subject for reference to the Committee on Public Lands; but from the title of the bill, as read, I suppose it belongs to a class of cases which have usually gone to the Committee on Private Land Claims. That committee have the general subject now before it, by the reference of another bill to provide for cases in which patents have not issued. I do not know what the nature of this bill is; but if it belongs to that category, they ought all to go to the same committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no choice of committees for this bill. The title of the bill, as I observe by the reading of it, is a little deceptive, and naturally suggests to the Senator the objection that he makes. My impression is that the bill ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands, but, I repeat, I have no preference in regard to it.

Mr. THURMAN. I think it had better go, as the title indicates, to the Committee on Private Land Claims; and if it is found to belong to the other committee, it will undoubtedly be reported back and sent to that committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest that the shorter way will be for the Secretary to read a few words in the body of the bill. Three or four lines of the second paragraph will show exactly what it is, and then, if the Senator wishes, I shall make no objection to the change of reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read the portion of the bill indicated.

The Chief Clerk read from the text of the bill as follows:

That in case of any claim to land in any State or Territory which has heretofore been confirmed by law, and in which no provision is made by the confirmatory statute for the making of surveys and the issue of patents, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the same to be accurately surveyed in accordance with the provisions of the thirteenth section of an act of Congress approved March 3, 1851, entitled "An act," &c.; and shall issue patents for the claims so confirmed, upon the presentation to the Commissioner of the General Land Office of plats of survey thereof, duly approved by the surveyor-general of any State or Territory, if the same be found correct by the said Commissioner: Provided, That such patents shall only operate as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall in no manner interfere with any valid adverse right, if such exist, to the same land, nor be construed to preclude a legal investigation and decision by the proper judicial tribunal between adverse claimants to the same land: Provided further, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. THURMAN. That is the precise subject that has always been referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and it is now before that committee by the reference of a bill introduced by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] and there are other bills that will no doubt be referred again to that committee. It is a subject of very great difficulty, on which the committee has made progress in its investigation and has voluminous information from the Departments. The bill ought to go to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CONKLING. I make no objection, except to the Senator's statement that such bills have always gone to the Committee on Private Land Claims. That I do object to, because my recollection is affirmatively otherwise; but I have no objection to accepting the motion of the Senator.

Mr. THURMAN. I can only say that ever since I have been on that committee they have always been sent to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 189) authorizing the Citizens' National Bank of Hagerstown, Maryland, to change its location; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 190) amending and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to further the administration of justice;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 481) making appropriations for extraordinary expenses of the naval service was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committe on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 482) to correct the enrollment of an act entitled "An act for the relief of P. W. Standefer" was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

The bill (H. R. No. 483) to authorize the cancellation of the export bond for a portion of the distilled spirits of John S. Miller on board of bonded cars of the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

LOAN OF 1858.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the morning business is through I desire to report back the bill (H. R. No. 478) to provide for the redemption of the loan of 1858, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to submit a resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will withhold the consideration of the bill until the morning business is through. I supposed it was through.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the credentials of P. B. S. Pinchback for a seat in the Senate of the United States for six years commencing on the 4th of March, 1873, being in regular form, he is entitled under the law and in conformity with the usages of the Senate to be sworn in as a member, and that whatever grounds of contest there may be as to his right to a seat should be made thereafter.

As this is a privileged matter, I give notice that to-morrow, after the conclusion of the morning business, I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made unless there be objection.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the Senator from Indiana will not press the consideration of that resolution at so early a day as to-morrow. The committee, as has been reported by the Senator from Indiana, is divided on the subject. It involves a question of vast importance; but there are other questions the immediate consideration of which is of more importance to the country than one relative to seating a Senator on this floor. That resolution will of course provoke debate, and it will consume considerable time in the discussion. I hope, therefore, it will not be fixed for to-morrow morning, but that the Senator from Indiana will consent to postpone it until after the holidays.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I do not think it would be wise to postpone the consideration of this question until after the holidays. Of course I should like to accommodate my friend from Delaware; but it seems to me that the Senate should decide this question at as early a day as possible. I do not expect that the question will be decided to-morrow. I think there will be debate upon it. I simply desire that we shall proceed to the consideration of it to-morrow, with the hope that we shall get through with it some time this week.

There are many reasons why this question should be decided speedily and should not go over until after the holidays. My friend from Delaware will have ample time, I have no doubt, to prepare himself for the argument of this resolution if he chooses to take part in it.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Are the reports and the evidence taken at the last Congress in all the Louisiana cases now before the Senate? If they are not, I wish to have them taken from the files of the Senate and laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator that they are not before the Senate.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I move, then, to take those papers from the files.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections made at the last session of Congress, in regard to the Louisiana case, so called, be taken from the files and laid before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Are they printed?

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. They are printed, and I want them where they will be accessible and can be used.

Mr. MORTON. I have no objection to the evidence formerly taken being placed on the table of each Senator. That does not make it, however, a part of this case. Mr. Pinchback was not a party to that proceeding, to the taking of that evidence, but I have no sort of objection that it shall be placed on the desk of every Senator for information. All have access to it anyhow without this motion.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question. I have been detained this morning from the business of the Senate and have not been here till just now. Does the Senator report from the committee a resolution merely?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana has reported that the committee were unable to agree, being equally divided, and the committee have been discharged from the further consideratio of the case.

Mr. MORTON. And I have offered a resolution declaring that Mr. Pinchback has a prima-facie case, and given notice that I shall move to take it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. CONKLING. The purpose of my inquiry is to ascertain how we may learn the condition of the case; the committee, of course, know. I infer that there is no written report from any portion of the committee, and I should like to inquire whether the evidence taken by the committee now is reported with the resolution.

Mr. MORTON. The committee has taken no evidence, and has, of course, reported none. The question as presented to the committee arose upon questions of law, upon the effect of the credentials of Mr. Pinchback, the decisions of the courts of Louisiana, and other matters that I might refer to.

Mr. CONKLING. So that there is no controversy of fact?

Mr. MORTON. We present no report in regard to the facts of the case.

Mr. CONKLING. And there is no controversy of fact now before us?

Mr. MORTON. Not as the matter stands now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to make an inquiry of my friend, as I was not in when he offered the resolution. Do I understand that no issue is made before the committee in this case except the question of law arising upon the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana and upon the credentials?

Mr. MORTON. The question before the committee, and upon which this case will be presented to the Senate, is the question of the right of Mr. Pinchback, upon his credentials—they being in proper form—to take his seat upon this floor, without going into the question of rights arising under the decisions of the courts of that State as to which is the Legislature of Louisiana and who is the governor, or the recognition of what is known as the Kellogg government by the President of the United States and by the action of the House of Representatives, and other questions of law that may be presented.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, do I understand that, supposing the Senate should decide that they had a right and that it was their duty to go back of that, there is any allegation on the part of those who opposed Mr. Pinckback—that there is any state of real facts behind these questions of law and behind this supposed recognition which would show that Pinckback was not duly elected?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir; it will be contended on the other side that Mr. Pinchback was not duly elected; that the Legislature which elected him was not in fact the Legislature of Louisiana. The question now is put upon the same basis it was in the admission of Mr. GOLDTHWAITE from Alabama. There was a contest; but it was claimed on the part of his friends that as his credentials were in regular form he had a right to be admitted to his seat upon the floor, and if there was any ground of contest it should come after that. The Committee on Privileges and Elections reported in favor of that principle, and Mr. GOLDTHWAITE took his seat, and the contest was afterward abandoned.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not mean to make any inquiry about tl at case, because I understood entirely the ground on which my friend stands in the resolution, and it is a very proper ground to be brought to the attention of the Senate undoubtedly; but I wished to inquire, as my friend from New York did, whether (supposing we should decide adversely to the prima-facieness, so to speak, of this case, and should say it was a subject for investigation) there was any other ground besides those of matters of law upon which opposition was made to his being really Senator. I understood the Senator to say there is.

Mr. MORTON. That resolves itself back into what is known as the Louisiana question, which we had before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are pretty intimately connected, and I should think it would be better for the Senate to have returned to its official possession, so to speak—they are in our possession now—all these documents, to be laid upon the table, where they may be the subject of consideration if the Senate chooses to consider them. I believe my friend agrees (for he makes no objection to that) that this evidence should be laid on the table, so that for information on the pending question any one can refer to them.

Mr. MORTON. Certainly; there can be no objection to that.

Mr. STEVENSON. I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana a question—whether this is the report of the committee?

Mr. MORTON. No; the committee were divided, and they have reported that fact to the Senate, and have been discharged, so that the question might come before the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. Do I understand that the report and the testimony, if any, taken before the committee are on the table and ordered to be printed?

Mr. MORTON. We have reported no testimony.

Mr. THURMAN. Nothing but the simple fact of credentials?

Mr. MORTON. That is all. The committee has been discharged, and I have now offered a resolution declaring that Mr. Pinchback has a prima-facie case on which he is entitled to his seat; and I have given notice that I will move to take it up to-morrow morning after the morning business.

Mr. THURMAN. This is not the proper time to argue it; but whenever it does come up I hope it will not be found very difficult to prove that he has no such prima-facie case as that on which the Senate has heretofore acted.

Mr. MORTON. I have no doubt about the Senator's opinion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY.]

Mr. BOREMAN. I wish to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee—whether they had not some documents before them showing the credentials of these different persons, Pinchback and McMillen? If they had, they should be laid before the Senate and printed for our information before this discussion commences. The credentials of one of these gentlemen were undoubtedly before them; and there must have been something, I suppose, upon which the other gentleman made his pretensions to the seat. If there were any papers of that sort, it would be well for us to have them all printed, so that we may know the precise papers that were before the committee and upon which they have acted. They must certainly have based even their disagreement upon something.

Mr. MORTON. There were the arguments of the counsel on each side before the committee, and upon one side printed briefs. Does the Senator desire to have them printed?

Mr. BOREMAN. No, sir.

Mr. MORTON. They will be furnished by counsel, I apprehend.

Mr. BOREMAN. I suppose that Mr. McMillen, as well as the other gentleman, had some sort of credentials, some papers upon which to base his claim, some certificate of election.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir; Mr. Pinchback had credentials from what is known as the Kellogg government, and the other had credentials from Mr. McEnery, claiming to be governor of Louisiana.

Mr. BOREMAN. I think it would be a matter of convenience for us to have those papers printed.

Mr. MORTON. I have no objection to that being done.

Mr. CONKLING. It concerns the convenience of all of us that we should dispose, if we can in duty dispose, of this case in the first instance in the view suggested by the Senator from Indiana, and I do not mean to suggest any doubt that we shall be able so to dispose of it, because he and the committee have investigated it and I have not. I venture, however, to make one suggestion about the motion of the Senator from Connecticut. The Senator from Indiana remarked that when the motion prevailed those papers would not be here as a part of the case. It seems to me that his point is very well taken. Mr. Pinchback, as I understand, was not a party or privy to the former investigation. Under the motion of the Senator from Connecticut we gain access to this information; but whether by that motion we so attach it to this case or incorporate it with the case that when we come to act upon it we can consider it as we could if it came from the committee, or was here in this session of Congress as part of this proceeding, I think there is considerable doubt about.

Mr. MORTON. I stated distinctly that it was not to be regarded as part of the case.

Mr. CONKLING. So I understood the honorable Senator; and, as I said, I think there was great reason for his reminding the Senate of that. It seemed to make but little impression, however, and therefore I ventured to refer to it again.

This motion, as the Senator from Ohio says, does not present the occasion for discussing this case. It does, however, present the occasion for our deciding intelligently what we are going to do, with a view to a further consideration to-morrow morning; and if the effect of the motion is only to be to enable every Senator to inform himself, he may go now and take up this document on the files and read it if he chooses; but if the effect is also to be to exempt Mr. Pinchback and his contestant from any legal operation of the document as a proceeding before the Senate, then I submit to the honorable Senator from Connecticut that it will answer no purpose except one of convenience. He can send a page to get this document and bring it to him; he can ask the Secretary for it; and if his motion is only to be a request for all the Senators to have it brought here, I do not see why we should not be in precisely the same condition with the motion as without it.

Mr. MORTON. I esteem it to be a matter of simple convenience to the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. If that is all the Senator from Connecticut intends by it, there is no objection to his motion, unless it might be objected to on the ground of surplusage. Any Senator can send and get the document, and every Senator can do the same thing. But if the motion is merely designed to obviate the necessity of each Senator supplying himself with this document, I have no objection to it. I am satisfied, however, that the motion as it presents itself to the Senate would carry a wholly different view, unless attention was called to it.

Mr. THURMAN. As I understand the case, the Senator from Indiana has only given notice; he has not submitted any motion.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Indiana has reported from the committee, or from a portion of the committee, a resolution declaring that, prima facie, Mr. Pinchback is entitled to the seat.

Mr. MORTON. No; that is my individual motion.

Mr. CONKLING. The committee, we are told, has divided, and the Senator from Indiana, representing himself and any other member of the committee who concurs with him—not reporting it from the committee; if I said that it was not technically right—presents a resolution thus declaring, and he gives notice——

Mr. THURMAN. I do not so understand.

Mr. MORTON. That is the correct statement.

Mr. THURMAN. Has the Senator from Indiana submitted a resolution?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. And it is on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the Senator from Indiana reported from the committee that the committee were unable to come to any conclusion, being divided, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, which, of course, returns the credentials both of Mr. Pinchback and Mr. McMillen to the custody of the Senate. Thereupon the Senator from Indiana, as a Senator, offered a resolution, which has been read, and he has given notice that he will move that the Senate proceed to-morrow, after the expiration of the morning business, to its consideration, declaring Mr. Pinchback entitled to the seat at present.

Mr. CONKLING. Precisely; that resolution declares that one of these parties is prima facie entitled to the seat. Then we are to be brought to-morrow morning to pass on this question. Pending this, the Senator from Connecticut moves, in order that we may proceed with the proper material before us, that there be brought here and put on our desk a document in which is recorded the result of another investigation which occurred in another session of Congress, that we may know what that is, and my purpose is simply to ask the attention of Senators to the fact that when that resolution prevails it will be in effect, as is suggested, just like every Senator sending for that document and supplying himself with it. It will be denied that it can be used as a part of the case, or that Mr. Pinchback or anybody else is to be affected by it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The report of the committee at the last session was before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the discussion which took place by counsel representing the parties referred to that report. It was quoted before the committee by the counsel of both parties. The committee was in possession of that report, and acted partly in reference to and upon what was divulged in that report made at the last session. It was part of the res gestæ, a part of this very case. It furnishes information and knowledge to the Senate, and to every member of the Senate; and if laid on their tables so that they can inspect it, it will furnish that information upon which they can act intelligently in reference to this subject. There ought therefore to be no objection to its being furnished to the Senate and placed on every member's table, so that we may understand this case intelligently and thoroughly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind Senators that this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent, no proposition being before the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to correct the statement of the Senator from Delaware in one respect. The report to which he alludes was before the committee because counsel brought it there and read from it just as they would read from a law-book; but it was no part of the case any more than 7 Howard or other authorities that were read from; on the contrary, it was read from in violation of the understanding with which the argument was had. The committee authorized the argument of the case by counsel, distinctly upon the understanding that the discussion was to be of a question of law; that we were not to go into the facts; but whether upon the law arising on the credentials, the decisions of the courts, and so on, Pinchback was entitled to his seat, or whether the committee should go behind them and into an investigation of facts, the argument was to be conducted on the first question, and although these things were brought there and read without objection, still they were no part of the case any more than the law-books that were read.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I certainly did not suppose there could possibly be an objection to taking the papers referred to from the files of the Senate and laying them upon the table for the information of the Senate, and still more as a part of the case which the Senator from Indiana proposes to consider to-morrow morning. At the last session of Congress a resolution was introduced in the Senate and passed, directing our Committee on Privileges and Elections to inquire whether a legal State government existed in the State of Louisiana. Upon that resolution a large amount of testimony was taken, and voluminous reports were made to the Senate by that Committee. Every citizen of the United States was a party to those proceedings, and the proceeding which is now before the Senate by the notification which is given us by the Senator from Indiana is also a proceeding in which every citizen of the United States is a party.

The question whether Mr. Pinchback is prima facie entitled to a seat in this body by reason of the credentials which he presents involves an inquiry into the official capacity of the officer purporting to sign those credentials, and of the Legislature named in those credentials as the electoral body which chose the gentleman who presents himself here claiming a seat; and we have in the papers now sought evidence of over a thousand pages, taken by a committee of this body upon those very questions at the last session of Congress. It must have been, in the nature of things, impossible for either side of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to have come to any conclusion as to the prima-facie right of Mr. Pinchback to a seat here without considering the very facts developed in the testimony to which I have referred.

Now, a resolution is introduced by a member of the committee—not a report from the committee as I understand it, but by a member of the committee—declaring Mr. Pinchback to be thus prima facie entitled to a seat, and yet Senators say that the very evidence taken by a committee of this body shall not be considered by us in order to arrive at a just conclusion as to the official capacity of the persons whose names are signed to and give all their efficacy to those credentials. Surely, sir, Senators do not mean this. If we are to go into an investigation as to the prima-facie right of Mr. Pinchback, we must go into the inquiry as to the gubernatorial capacity of Mr. Kellogg; we must go into the electoral capacity of a body of men claiming to be a legislature with power to choose a Senator to make laws for the United States. Suppose that, when the resolution of the Senator from Indiana is before the Senate, my friend on my right [Mr. WRIGHT] moves to strike out the words "prima facie," as he may do, and the question is left before the Senate then as to the absolute right of Mr. Pinchback; the Senator would say at once that the evidence which has been thus taken and is upon the files of the Senate was a part of the case before the Senate, and ought to be considered by it. It was in this view, I confess, that I made the motion I did, not believing it possible that anybody could object to our having possession of the information which we need in order to arrive at a just conclusion, and that to stop our having that information the technicalites relating to parties and privies to a case in court should be made use of.

Mr. SHERMAN. As this debate is likely to be somewhat lengthy and is open to objection at any time, the resolution offered by the Senator from Connecticut being open to a single objection, I think it had better go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator that this debate has been going on by unanimous consent. There is no question pending before the Senate, the Senate having already adopted by unanimous consent the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I will simply enter an objection and let the matter go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects to any further debate.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Will not this resolution of the Senator from Connecticut be the first thing in order to-morrow?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been adopted.

PUBLICATION OF NAMES OF ABSENTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Revision of the Rules:

Resolved, That the resolution adopted by the Senate on the 4th of May, 1864, directing the reporter in making up the proceedings of the Senate for publication to put in a separate list the names of absentees in each call of the yeas and nays, be rescinded.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the numbers and the distribution of public documents, bills, or reports, printed by the Congressional Printer, and to report what changes, if any, are necessary.

This is the same resolution that was passed at the last session, and the committee had partly performed the duty devolved upon them by the Senate, and this is to enable them to complete it.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LOAN OF 1858.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] from the Committee on Finance is before the Senate. It will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that is acted on I desire to make a report from the Committee on Finance. The committee have instructed me to report back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 478) to provide for the redemption of the loan of 1858. As the bill has practically passed both Houses, and the amendments are of minor importance, I ask for its immediate consideration. It should be acted on at once.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which provides in the first section that for the purpose of redeeming the bonds issued under the act entitled "An act to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $20,000,000," approved June 14, 1858, as amended March 3, 1859, called "the loan of 1858," it is hereby declared to be the pleasure of the United States to pay all the coupon bonds of the loan of 1858, as well as the registered bonds of that issue, on the 1st day of January, 1874, at which date the interest thereon shall cease; and coin in the Treasury sufficient to carry into effect this provision is appropriated therefor.

The second section authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an equal amount, at par of principal and interest, of 5 per cent. bonds of the funded loan under the act for refunding the national debt, approved July 14, 1870, and the act amendatory thereof, approved January 20, 1871, for such of the bonds of the loan of 1858 as the holders thereof may, on or before February 1, 1874, elect to exchange for the 5 per cent. bonds of the funded loan, with interest from January 1. No commissions or allowances whatever are to be paid for the exchange of bonds thus authorized.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was to strike out in lines 10 and 11 of section 1 the words "of 1858, as well as the registered bonds of said issue," so as to read:

It is hereby declared to be the pleasure of the United States to pay all the coupon bonds of said loan on the 1st day of January, 1874.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, lines 14 and 15, to strike out the words "carry into effect the provisions of this act is appropriated therefor," and insert "redeem said coupon bonds is hereby appropriated for that purpose;" so as to read:

And coin in the Treasury sufficient to redeem said coupon bonds is hereby appropriated for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, lines 6 and 7, to strike out the words "such of said," and insert in lieu thereof "any of the;" so as to read "for any of the bonds of the loan of 1858," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 8, to strike out the word "as" before the words "the holders," and insert the word "which" in line 10 after the word "the;" and before "funded" insert "said;" and at the end of the section add: "And no interest shall be allowed on the new bonds for any time for which interest is paid on the bonds exchanged."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendments reported by the Committee on Finance having been agreed to, I wish simply to call the attention of the Senate to a claim made on the part of the House of Representatives which they have not seen proper to present to the Senate in a formal way. It has been asserted on the part of the House of Representatives that the Senate had no power to originate this bill, which is simply a bill to provide for the payment of a debt. The Constitution prohibits the Senate from originating "bills for raising revenue;" but I believe this is the first time in the history of legislation when it has been denied that the Senate had the power to originate a bill appropriating money to pay a debt, or for any purpose whatever. If the theory now put forward by the House of Representatives is true, we have no power to pass a pension bill or any bill whatever, providing for the payment of any debt to a creditor, or to a pensioner, or to ourselves, because it is a money bill.

I merely wish to call attention to the fact that the bill which the Senate passed the other day unanimously was laid aside, and to preserve the powers of the House, as was alleged, this bill, substantially like the Senate bill, was passed there. With the amendments which have been already made by the Senate, this is practically the same bill that originally passed the Senate.

I wished simply to call the attention of the Senate to this matter. I trust there will never be any controversy between the Senate and the House about this point. It is always unpleasant. But if the case should arise when the necessity was less pressing than it is for the passage of this bill, I should be disposed to make the point and have it settled at once, and not have this controversy back and forth between the two Houses. The power to originate a revenue bill is clearly with the House of Representatives, and never, with my consent, has it been invaded in the least. I certainly would never report a bill to the Senate that levied a tax on the people, because that must come from the House; but when they extend it beyond that, to a bill appropriating money, especially to a bill providing for the payment of a debt, it is carrying the proposition too far, and at some time or other the Senate will have to make the point upon it, and insist on its constitutional right to originate all bills except bills for raising revenue. I have not made the point in this case because of the pressing necessity for the passage of this bill now.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EFFECT OF ABOLITION OF THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. GORDON. I ask leave to call up the resolution which I offered the other day, calling for information from the Postmaster-General relative to the abolition of the franking privilege, in order that I may offer a substitute embracing the suggestions made by various Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Ohio is properly before the Senate; but if there be no objection the Chair will put the question on the motion of the Senator from Georgia, which is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution indicated by him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that resolution is considered, I wish to say that a bill was discussed the other day in regard to banks without circulation, and unless some Senator desires to discuss it further, I should like to have it taken up and acted on; but if any Senator desires to examine the question, or to look into it, or to discuss it further, I will not call it up now.

Mr. COOPER. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] desires to discuss it, and he is not in his seat.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I will not call it up. I have no desire to debate the resolution before the Senate reported by the Committee on Finance. I desire to get a vote of the Senate on the general proposition as to whether any measure shall be reported at the present session of Congress in favor of specie payments. My own views have been expressed two or three times in the Senate, and I have no addition to make and nothing to say now. The members of the Committee on Finance have all seriatim expressed their opinions on this subject, and I for one do not propose to weary the Senate by repeating what I have said so often in regard to the necessity for coming to specie payments. Therefore, I am prepared to vote upon the resolution, and upon any amendments that may be offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question being on the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] moves to lay over that order and all prior orders, and to proceed to the consideration of the resolution introduced by him in regard to the franking privilege. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; I object to that. I want a vote on the resolution reported by the Finance Committee.

Mr. GORDON. I think the Senator from Ohio misunderstands me. I simply wanted to offer a substitute for the resolution previously offered by myself, embracing suggestions made by various Senators.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that if it will not take time.

Mr. GORDON. There will be no debate, I apprehend.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolution of the Senator from Georgia will be regarded as before the Senate.

Mr. GORDON. I now present a substitute for the resolution previously offered, and ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the abolition of the franking privilege was intended to economize the expenditures of the Government; and, whereas, its abolition prevents the general distribution to the people of improved field and garden seeds, thus defeating in a measure the benefits which otherwise would accrue to the agriculture of the country from the establishment of the Agricultural Department; and also discourages the distribution of public documents, which afford important information and are an educator of the people; and, whereas, to compensate the people for these losses, there should be an important reduction of the expenditures in the postal service of the Government: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to report for the information of the Senate—

1. What amount of expense, if any, has been saved to the Government by the abolition of the franking privilege; and that he state specifically and fully the items in which expense has been saved, and the amount so saved in each and every particular, separating in his report the particulars in which expense has been saved and the amounts so saved by the abolition of the privilege as it relates to members of Congress, heads of Departments, and all other formerly free mail matter.

2. How many employés in the postal service have been discharged, and how much less is charged by railroads and other carriers of the mail since the abolition of said privilege, and whether any additional clerks and additional expense have been added to the Department in the care, sale, &c., of postage stamps, and the amount of clear profit arising by reason of the additional sale of stamps.

3. The amount of revenue derived from each class of mailable matter, respectively and specifically as to letter postage, and postage upon books, newspapers, and pamphlets, and as to registered letters, and the money-order business, and the gross amount, avoirdupois, of each class transported through the mails.

4. Whether it has been the practice of the Departments, or either of them, since appropriations have been made for official stamps to send documents or packages, heretofore sent by mail, by express; if orders have been issued by any Department to its subordinates to send such matter to the Department by express and not by mail, and out of what appropriation payment for such expressage has been made.

5. Whether the Postmaster-General construes the law as authorizing the free transmission of mail matter by or to the Post-Office Department.

6. How much less appropriation will be required for the postal service now than prior to the abolition of such privilege.

Mr. GORDON. I ask unanimous consent to have that resolution adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope it will be done informally. I have no objection to the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question on the adoption of the resolution as modified.

The resolution of Mr. GORDON, as modified by him, was agreed to.

SPECIE PAYMENTS—THE CURRENCY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the reading of the resolution now pending, which is the special order. I have no desire to say anything further on the subject.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress during its present session to adopt definite measures to redeem the pledge made in the act approved March 18, 1869, entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," as follows:

"And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin."

And the Committee on Finance is directed to report to the Senate at as early a day as practicable such measures as will not only redeem this pledge of the public faith, but will also furnish a currency of uniform value, always redeemable in gold or its equivalent, and so adjusted as to meet the changing wants of trade and commerce.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I offer the following as a substitute for the resolution:

Strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

That the Committee on Finance is directed to report to the Senate at as early a day as practicable such measures as will restore commercial confidence and give stability and elasticity to the circulating medium, by making banking free to all, by providing for an increase of currency of $100,000,000, (including the $44,000,000 reserve,) by making the whole currency of Government issue and lawful money by the issue of currency bonds bearing 3.65 per cent. interest.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, I wish to submit some remarks upon the resolution reported by the chairman of the committee. Before doing so I will ask that the views of the minority be read by the Clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the views of the minorty.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution reported as the views of the minority by Mr. BAYARD is as follows:

Whereas a just regard for the interests of every class of the community demands that the national basis of finance shall consist of a uniform standard and intrinsic value: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, instructed to report to the Senate measures which will secure at the earliest practicable day a return to specie payments.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, there is just this difference between the resolution submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Finance and that submitted by the Senator from Delaware, on the part of the minority of that committee. The one declares it the duty of Congress during its present session to adopt definite measures for the redemption of the United States notes in coin, but also declares it to be its duty to furnish a currency of uniform value, always redeemable in coin or its equivalent, and so adjusted as to meet the changing wants of commerce and trade; while the other instructs the committee to report to the Senate measures which will secure at the earliest practicable day a return to specie payments.

The one contemplates legislation in respect to the currency, while the other looks solely to measures for the redemption of the existing currency in coin, and that too at the earliest practicable period.

To be sure, these resolutions are not legislation. They do not bind Congress to do anything upon the subject-matter, nor do they undertake to define when the earliest practicable day for the resumption of specie payments shall be.

It is now nearly five years since Congress made a memorable pledge to the same effect. I read from the act of March 18, 1869:

And the United States also pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

What could sound fairer to the ear? What could be more explicit? What could the United States pledge, possessing higher guarantee to the holder of its notes, than its faith? Well, that "earliest practicable period" when this redemption should take place has not come yet; and yet, as everybody is aware, the intervening years have been marked by a higher degree of prosperity than this nation has ever known. Never, during all of our national life, has there been such diversified industrial activity; never for the same period of time have the products of labor been so large, or our commerce, foreign and domestic, so great; never was labor better paid. In fine, in agriculture, mining and manufactures especially, in commerce at home and abroad, in the increased acreage of the land cultivated—in the founding of new communities—in the extension of railways and the development of our great natural resources, the nation never exhibited greater signs of prosperity. During all this time we proudly pointed to our paper currency as the best the country had ever possessed. We boasted of its uniformity in value in all parts of the United States; of the excellence of its engraving, rendering counterfeits the next thing to impossible, and, above all, our pride was that it rested upon the wealth and credit of the country for ultimate redemption. We read upon the face of every greenback the promise of the United States to pay the bearer so much money, and upon the face of every bank note the promise of the bank to pay in money or greenbacks on presentation. So that while the bank note might be redeemed in a United States note or greenback, we knew that the greenback could be redeemed in nothing but coin. It was not a promise as in the case of a national-bank note to redeem in another promise, but to pay the bearer so many dollars. And that was interpreted, and rightly too, to mean metallic dollars—gold or silver—the money of the Constitution, the recognized standard of value of the world.

Indorsing this view, came first the declaration by Congress in March, 1869, in the act to strengthen the public credit, and then the decision of the Supreme Court. There is nobody, I take it, that denies at this day this interpretation of the nation's obligation written upon the face of every greenback. The promise is to pay the bearer so many dollars, either at Washington or at the office of the assistant treasurer in New York. That means that they shall be paid on the demand of the holder. They are not post notes, but demand notes, due whenever presented at the place where payable for payment. If they were the notes of an individual or a bank, no one would doubt the nature of the obligation nor the effect of a refusal to pay. The notes would go to protest, the individual into bankruptcy, and the bank into the hands of a receiver.

While this is the strict legal view of the obligation of the greenback, I know it is urged that greenbacks were issued at a time of great national necessity because there was very little specie in the country at the time, inadequate entirely to the wants of the Government, and not available on account of the suspension of the banks, and because there was an absolute necessity for a larger volume of currency which possessed the functions of money. The Government, at that time in close grapple with the rebellion, needed money to carry on the war. The soldiers and sailors must be paid: they must be fed and clothed and supplied with arms and munitions of war and transportation. A great deal of money was needed; at first a million a day—then two millions, and finally three. Congress, driven to its wit's end to devise the ways and means to procure it in such amounts as were needed, devised in a happy moment of inspiration the greenback scheme, which has accomplished such a wonderful success. But it was in its nature a forced loan. You compelled soldiers, contractors, and every creditor of the Government to accept as money, and in full discharge of the debt, the promissory notes of the Government. It was as if a man deeply embarrassed, but with plenty of property, should call his creditors around him and say, "Gentlemen, I owe you and haven't the money to pay. Take my due-bills with my blessing. When I am able to pay, I will take them all up." There was just this difference in the two cases. Congress compelled the creditor to accept the due-bills. The citizen debtor had no such power. The debtor in the one case could be sued on his due-bills if not paid on presentation, while the United States could not be. The due-bill of the citizen was a simple evidence of debt; the greenback possessed the function of paying debts.

When the act of Congress passed creating greenbacks and imparting to them the qualities of money and making them a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt, its constitutionality was questioned all over the country. It was regarded and treated as a war measure necessary for the exigencies of the times and justified only by that necessity. When we looked into the Constitution for the power, we found these words, and no more, in the enumeration of the powers of Congress:

> To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin.

We found the States prohibited from coining money, emitting bills of credit, and from making anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts. Thus stood the Constitution.

The objectors argued that money could not be coined from paper, leather, or any other material than metals, and that the framers of the Constitution intended from the clause I have quoted, and from the context, to confer upon Congress the simple power of coining money from gold, silver, and copper, the only metallic currency then in use in the world, and that this was all the power conferred on it.

On the other hand, it was urged that as the States were prohibited from making anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, there was in the very terms of that prohibition an implication that Congress might do what the States could not, that is to say, make something else than coin a legal tender in the payment of debts. This view, as we know, prevailed, and it is too late now to draw in question the constitutionality of that legislation on which the greenback issues rest.

But the law, as originally passed, was as just as the necessities of the case allowed. Congress had provided as to the bonds, which had a long time to run, that the interest should be paid semi-annually in coin, and those holding greenbacks were allowed to fund them in these bonds so as to compensate them for any damage or loss in being kept out of the promised coin when the Treasury could not or would not redeem them upon presentation.

I repeat that the holder of the greenbacks could, at his option, at any time convert them into the time obligations of the Government bearing 6 per cent. interest, which contained explicit guarantees for the payment of both principal and interest. Upon these obligations the Government has never made default, but scrupulously has observed its promises; and we have seen, as the gratifying result of its good faith, these obligations constantly rising in value, until they now are, and for some time past have been, worth their face in gold both at home and abroad, and even command a premium.

But Congress, in an evil hour, as I think, repealed that portion of the law allowing the conversion of greenbacks into bonds at the option of the holder, the repeal to take effect after the 1st of July, 1863. As at first issued there was this indorsement upon them:

> This note is a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt, and is exchangeable for United States 6 per cent. twenty-year bonds, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years.

The act of March 3, 1863, which destroyed this option after the 1st day of July following, was an act of injustice, because it was a breach of the plighted faith of the United States to those who had taken them in good faith, relying upon this guarantee that they could at pleasure exchange them for bonds. From that time forth the greenbacks have been at a discount as compared with the bonds, and must continue so until Congress shall take measures either to allow their conversion into interest-bearing bonds or compel their redemption in coin.

As the matter stands now, we have $356,000,000 of this legal-tender issue afloat, circulating as money, without any power in the holders to get the promised coin, or to exchange them for bonds. They are dishonored promises to pay, or, as my friend from Vermont the other day styled them, "engraved falsehoods." This state of things has continued for ten years, and is likely to continue for ten years to come unless Congress takes measures to wipe away the dishonor.

But how shall this be done? If we count the $44,000,000 United States notes retired while Mr. McCulloch was Secretary of the Treasury, and until recently supposed to be redeemed and canceled notes, as a part of the valid greenback issue, it will require $400,000,000 of coin to redeem them. When redeemed, of course, the national banks, will be compelled to redeem their circulation in coin, which will require $354,000,000 more.

But suppose that the Government after redeeming them continues to treat them as lawful money and pay them out in discharge of its debts and in the payment of current expenses. They must in that case be redeemed again, and as often as they are issued, if the holder of them prefers coin. Thus it will be seen that Congress when it enters upon the work of redemption must take measures not only to redeem them once, but as often as they are reissued. And right here comes the difficulty. While no doubt it is practicable to borrow $400,000,000 of gold to redeem the entire issue once, yet if we are to maintain redemption we must be prepared to supply ourselves with the requisite amount of coin not only to resume, but to maintain resumption.

I repeat, sir, where is the coin to come from? If the Treasury, in addition to what is in its vaults now, could command all the coin in the country, in the hands of the banks and individuals, nobody supposes that there is enough at this time to redeem one-half of the outstanding greenbacks. There has been ever since the war a constant drain of the precious metals abroad. We are paying about $100,000,000 of coin a year in the shape of interest upon our national bonds, and probably more than one-half of them are held in Europe, where the interest must go. In addition to this there is a large volume of indebtedness of the States, cities, mining and manufacturing companies, and railway corporations held abroad, amounting in the aggregate to a greater sum than the national bonds, which are in the hands of foreign capitalists and on which we pay interest. The whole product of our mines, large as it is, is insufficient to pay this interest account. More than this, and worse than all, the balance of trade every year for the last ten years has been against us, and this balance has to be adjusted in coin or its equivalent. Until recently there has been a constant outflow of specie from this country to pay these balances. We cannot discharge them in our greenbacks or national-bank notes. They can be paid only with money, such money as is recognized by the commercial world; that is, gold and silver.

I should not omit to say in this connection that it is estimated that American citizens traveling in Europe spend $75,000,000 a year, of course in gold.

Mr. President, it is mournful to study those monthly reports emanating from the Treasury Department, which exhibit the state of our commerce with foreign countries. On the one hand, what we export is in the main the necessaries of life—such things as people must have to subsist on and clothe themselves with. To be sure, they are comprehensively classed as commodities the growth, produce, and manufactures of the United States; but when you come to analyze the tables you find what is exported is chiefly raw material, the products of the soil, the mines, the quarries, and the forests; but where are the manufactures? Leaving out the oils, mineral and animal, a few sewing-machines, mowers, and reapers, a little leather, and certain classes of machinery, and our tables of exports present a dreary barrenness of the products of skilled labor. Thus, last year, we exported over $227,000,000 in value of unmanufactured cotton, while all the manufactures of every kind, produced from that material, exported by us amounted to less than $3,000,000 in value. We exported last fiscal year in gold and silver bullion and in gold and silver coin $76,905,546. That exhausted and more than exhausted the entire products of our mines, whose yearly income is rated at, I believe, about $58,000,000.

In the mean time, what have we been importing during the last fiscal year? Here again we must turn to the tables. The total of those imports, including both those dutiable and free of duty, was the startling sum of $663,410,597. I embrace in this statement all commodities entered for immediate consumption and those entered for warehousing, which mostly go into consumption ultimately.

Now, sir, contemplate a few of the items. I want to show in this connection what we recklessly and needlessly import, to the detriment of our domestic industries, which could just as well have furnished to our hand most of the articles we have run in debt to buy, or which we were better off to do without entirely.

I begin with the manufactures of wool. We imported—

Cloths and cassimeres	$16,000,000
Shawls, a little short of	3,000,000
Carpets, about	4,333,000
Dress goods, about	19,500,000
Hosiery, shirts, and drawers	613,000
Other manufactures of wool not specified	7,500,000
Total manufactures of wool	50,946,000

Leaf-tobacco	6,500,000
Cigars	3,330,300
Perfumery and cosmetics, a little over	1,000,000
Precious stones, a fraction short of	3,000,000
Printing-paper, writing-paper, paper hangings, papier-maché, and other manufactures of paper, upward of	2,000,000
Paintings, chromo-lithographs, and statuary, say	1,330,300
Musical instruments	1,000,000
Leather of all kinds	6,750,000
Gloves of kid, and all other, of skin or leather, say	3,500,000

Pig-iron	7,203,769
Bar-iron	5,288,481
Railroad bars or rails of iron	10,541,036
Hardware	6,643,512
Machinery	1,693,966
Muskets, pistols, rifles, and sporting guns	822,119
Steel ingots, bars, sheets, and wire	4,155,234
Railroad bars or rails of steel	9,199,666
Cutlery	2,234,347
Total of iron and steel and their manufactures	47,782,130

I have omitted other varieties of iron and steel manufactures imported, exceeding in value $10,000,000.

I spoke a moment ago of the amount of raw cotton exported, while the entire manufactures of cotton exported by us were less than $3,000,000 in value. Let us now again turn to the tables, to ascertain the amount of cotton manufactures imported into the country during the last fiscal year:

The amount of the bleached and unbleached was	$3,865,558
Of printed, painted, or colored	5,028,256
Of hosiery, shirts, and drawers	5,449,201
Of jeans, denims, drillings, &c.	536,393
Of other manufactures of cotton	20,321,909

We imported—

Of earthen, stone, and china ware	6,015,906
Of fancy goods	4,861,199
Of household and personal effects and wearing apparel	16,248,421
Our importation of human hair and its manufactures was	932,026
Our importation of jewelry exceeded	1,000,000

Looking at this list, who shall say that we have not been the most improvident and extravagant people under the sun, trampling under foot all wise economic laws? This country ought, upon its thousand hills and boundless prairies, to raise sheep enough to clothe our bodies, and we should have skill and enterprise enough to manufacture the wool into its various forms of usefulness. Yet I have enumerated manufactures of wool imported into this country in a single year amounting in value to upward of $50,000,000.

The exhibit I give of the imports of iron and steel manufacture is more startling still, amounting to nearly $60,000,000, while our imports of the manufactures of cotton, as I have shown, is upward of $35,000,000. We sent our raw cotton to England, France, and Germany, and here it comes back to us, after traversing the ocean twice, with foreign labor and skill added, to the extent of many millions.

Sir, no country on earth is blessed with richer deposits of iron ore than ours; none can be more accessible by water and railroad routes; and yet, here I present you with the manufactures from that ore imported within a single year from foreign countries, mounting up to nearly $60,000,000. What a blind ignoring is this of our natural mineral resources and our labor and skill!

But what I want in this connection to call the attention of the Senate to is the extravagant importation of mere luxuries, which minister only to pride and extravagance, such as jewelry, fancy goods, gloves, musical instruments, carpets, shawls, precious stones, dress goods, cosmetics and perfumery, and many other articles I will not pause to enumerate, amounting in the aggregate to many millions. I have not enumerated the silk goods and laces, and foreign liquors, of which we import so largely.

While this extravagance of importation continues, of things which, as I have said, we do not need and were better off without; or which we could as well produce at home, giving variety to our industry and profitable employment to our own mechanics and manufacturers, I see no prospect of a speedy return to specie payments.

It is a very evident proposition to me, Mr. President, that if we export all the specie extracted from our own mines or brought into the country, in paying the excess of imports over exports, year by year, we are in no condition to maintain specie payments, although by a spasmodic effort we might, by borrowing coin, redeem our legal-tender notes once.

What, then, is the actual condition of our circulating medium, having the properties of money, and which this resolution commits Congress to provide for redeeming?

The recent report of the Treasurer of the United States shows that on the 30th of June last the outstanding amount of the national currency was as follows:

Legal-tender notes issued	$356,000,000 00
Deducting amount on hand	6,392,771 00
Left in circulation	349,607,229 00
The fractional currency outstanding was	44,799,365 44
Deduct amount on hand	6,709,847 71
Which left in circulation	38,089,517 73

The sum total of legal-tender notes and fractional currency in circulation on that day was $387,696,746.73.

But this expresses only a part of our currency.

On the 1st of November, 1873, there were 1,980 national banks in existence, having an authorized circulation of $354,000,000, and an actual circulation of $348,360,149; the sum of $5,649,051 being still due to banks organized or in process of organization.

The paper currency of all kinds in circulation, it will thus be seen, is $736,056,895; greater by two-thirds than the entire paper circulation of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in August last. To this should be added whatever sum has been drawn from the forty-four million greenback reserve, so called. The actual paper circulation at this time, including the bank reserves, is not probably far from $750,000,000; making nearly $19 per capita to our population, estimated at forty millions.

By the census of 1870 the entire wealth of the country was estimated at about thirty thousand million dollars, so that the currency of the country as compared with its wealth is not far from 4 per cent.

Now, it is important to understand what relation the present volume of our currency bears to that furnished by the banks of the several States before the war. That circulation in the year 1860 amounted to $207,102,000. So that it will be seen that the national bank notes and the legal-tender notes now constituting our circulation amount to more than three and a half times the entire circulation authorized in 1860 by all the States of the Union.

The bank circulation of the States in 1862, previous to the greenback issue, had increased somewhat over that of 1860, being $238,671,210; and the amount per capita at that time was $7.59, and the ratio of this circulation to the wealth of the country was at that time 1¼ per cent. I know that gold and silver constituted in 1860 and 1861 no inconsiderable part of the circulating medium of the country, but I am not able to state the exact ratio it bore to the paper currency—probably not greater, however, than one-third or one-half at most.

I have given these statistics to the Senate to show that, whether we measure the present volume of our currency by the wealth or population of the country, the percentage is largely in excess of the paper currency, gold, and silver, which constituted the circulating medium of the country in 1860 and 1862.

What ratio the money of a country should bear to its population and wealth is a very vexed question, upon which neither theorists nor practical business men are agreed. Many things have to be taken into consideration. Much would depend upon the nature of its productions—whether of annual growth, as in agricultural countries, or whether the inhabitants were principally engaged in manufacturing, mining, navigation, and commerce, as in Great Britain. More would depend upon the character of the population in respect to intelligence, invention, skill, and enterprise. It is evident enough that what would be a just proportion in one country would not be in another. It is not true that the wealth of a country is to be determined by the amount of money it possesses. Spain was neither more wealthy nor prosperous than her neighbors after the discovery of this country, and when the metallic wealth of New Mexico and South America poured in upon her in such affluence as was never known before or since. For ages the precious metals have been pouring into India, and are absorbed and remain there; and yet in what country is the laboring population more poorly paid, or have fewer of the comforts of life?

I have not adduced the facts I have given in respect to the amount of our currency, nor instituted the comparison that its volume bears to that which we had in 1860 and 1862, for the purpose of showing that no more currency is needed at this time to carry on the business, trade, and commerce of the country. Indeed, sir, it is quite evident that at certain seasons of the year, in the fall and winter months especially, there is great stringency in the money market—more money being required to purchase and move the crops to market than can be commanded. The President, in his last message to us, has very plainly said so, and it is very clearly implied in the reports laid upon our desks of those gentlemen managing the national finances, whose opinions command our respect. I refer to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer, and Comptroller of the Currency; all of them qualified, by the positions they hold and their means of information, to speak to us with authority upon this question.

The voice of the entire West, if I except capitalists and bankers, who have money to loan, is emphatic that we require more currency. There is one test which I regard as demonstrative that we have too little money. I refer to the extraordinarily high rate of interest which prevails throughout the western country. There must be a real scarcity when for legitimate purposes money commands 12 per cent.

But, Mr. President, I did not rise to discuss this precise question, nor the merit of the many schemes offered to graduate the currency to the wants of production and trade at different seasons of the year. That is a deep and very difficult question—I mean the adjustment of our currency to the legitimate wants of business, by a plan comprehensive enough to embrace the present and future, which shall relieve the present distress, and which shall look forward steadily to a return to specie payments, when all the currency now passing as money and all we shall add to it shall be money in fact, in its ready convertibility into gold and silver. In voting for the resolution submitted by the Committee on Finance, I wish it to be distinctly understood I do it in the expectation that the committee will furnish to the Senate a plan by which the volume of the currency may be increased at needed seasons without undue inflation. But we must constantly guard against doing anything which shall disturb the present system of values, derange prices, or affect materially existing relations between creditors and debtors. Any legislation which shall cause these results—will be vicious and disastrous.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SCOTT in the chair.) The question is on the adoption of the substitute of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] for the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

Mr. MORTON. I hope the question will not be taken now. There are several Senators here whom I have heard express a desire to speak on this resolution before the vote is taken. I should be glad to be heard upon it myself for a short time, but I am not prepared to speak to-day. I hope, unless other Senators wish to speak upon it now, that it may go over until another time.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I was about to make a motion that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senate is indisposed to take a vote on this resolution now and the Senator from Indiana desires to have it postponed, I will move, leaving it still the order of business, to take up the bill in regard to national banks without circulation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland claim the floor?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I do not. I proposed to make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to make one other suggestion. I should be glad to hear the chairman of the committee and other members of the committee upon this subject before the vote is taken. As to whether it is desirable or proper that we should make definite arrangements at this session to return to specie payments, may depend somewhat upon the plan of the proposition, and I should be glad, therefore, to hear the distinguished chairman and other members of the committee on that subject before this debate is closed.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend will not draw me into the discussion until I am quite ready for it. I desire to say that my opinions were expressed at the last session, and if they had had any weight with him would have brought us to specie payments practically on the 1st of January next, without any severe stringency of the money market; but they did not seem to convert him then. My opinions are still unchanged. I will furnish him, with a great deal of pleasure, with a copy of the speech that I made at the last session of Congress, [laughter,] to which he listened with attention, but which did not seem to have any effect upon him.

Now, Mr. President, we have had two speeches made from the Committee on Finance; one by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] who spoke substantially in favor of the proposition that he has now offered; another by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] who submitted his proposition looking to an immediate resumption of specie payments. No one is authorized to speak for the Committee on Finance, although there has not been any such great diversity of opinion in the committee as has been telegraphed throughout the country, I have no doubt that the Committee on Finance is prepared to carry into execution the wish of the Senate as expressed after any such debate as they may choose to have on this proposition. My own opinions are still as they were at the last session—that to fix a time at some future day, say on the 1st of January a year hence, or even sooner, when the Government of the United States will redeem its broken promises, either in coin or in a bond which is intrinsically as valuable as coin, and which in the money market of the world is substantially equivalent to coin, is, in my judgment, the wisest solution we can make of this most difficult proposition.

But I do not intend to be drawn into this debate until I am instructed by the Senator from Indiana and by all the other Senators who wish to speak on this subject. Then, if I think I can express any view which is new, or different from that which I entertained before, or throw any light on the subject, I will with great pleasure engage in the debate; but until then I am ready to be instructed, but am not prepared to instruct.

Now, Mr. President, if it is the pleasure of the Senate to let this matter go over until to-morrow, I will move to take up the bill—the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] being present—that was up on Thursday last, in regard to national banks without circulation.

Mr. BOREMAN. I have no objection to proceeding with the bill of the Senator from Ohio, but probably we are not ready to do so yet. There is some executive business to be transacted, and I think we should proceed with that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the Senator any objection to taking up the bill in regard to banks without circulation?

Mr. BOREMAN. No, sir; I have no objection to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator from Delaware wish to speak on the bill?

Mr. BAYARD. No, sir. There was some misapprehension in regard to my desire to again address the Senate in opposition to the bill referred to by the Senator from Ohio. I had no special desire to speak on that subject. I still continue of the same opinion I before expressed—that the passage of such a bill would be very unadvisable. It is quite possible that I can suggest additional reasons to those which I very hastily offered two or three days ago when the bill was first introduced. I did not desire that there should be any postponement of the measure in order that I might speak upon it. My opposition to it was declared, and, as at present advised, I am still disposed to continue it. But I am not disposed to delay the consideration of the measure, because, my opinions upon it having been expressed, it remains for the Senate to decide whether they agree with the opponents of the measure or its friends.

I will say, however, that the measure is one of a very broad nature, and it should, I think, be more thoroughly considered by the Senate. I notice the absence of a good many Senators from their seats who might desire to say a word on the subject, and who certainly would desire to vote upon the proposition as it stands. Therefore, unless there is some very pressing reason (of which I have no knowledge whatever) for the consideration of the bill, I suggest that it be not considered by the Senate at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said I would not call it up if any Senator desired delay. All that I wish is to expedite public business which can be better considered now than it can be a day or two hence, when we shall have to consider appropriation bills and other public measures. If the Senator from Delaware desires a fuller Senate, or for any reason wishes a postponement of the bill, I will not call it up. That will necessarily postpone it until after the holidays. All I desire is to do my duty to the committee who reported the bill and to ask the Senate to act upon it at as early a day as possible. Unless the Senator wishes it postponed, I would rather consider it now. If he desires time, as a matter of course I have no objection.

Mr. BAYARD. While I have very positive opinions respecting the bill, my wishes are simply those of a Senator. If the honorable Senator who has charge of the measure considers it best that it should be brought to a vote at this time, I have nothing to say and no suggestion to make that will lead to the least delay in taking the vote upon it. But, sir, it is a question which affects every portion of the country. The bill provides for the creation of a brood of small banks of dimensions not hitherto known to our laws. It is a question that perhaps will be viewed in the same light of disfavor by those who admire the present banking system and those, like myself, who do not.

The effect of the creation of an unlimited number of banks without circulation, but recognized by the United States Government as banks of deposit and having charters, so to speak, under the present national banking system, will be to make banking very cheap; and I fear there will be great practical danger occurring to the ignorant, the poor, and the inexperienced by thus giving the sanction of a Government name or corporation to anybody who can scrape together $10,000 and change his shop into a Government bank. We all know the potential effect of the word "bank" or the name "banker" upon the mass of the people. It seems to imply wealth and responsibility, although we also know that it may be the guarantee of neither. Now, if $10,000 being scraped together shall give the owner the right to call himself a national bank, or any number of smaller owners, depend upon it that you will have men without responsibility either of character or wealth, who being thus favored with the name of a national incorporation will induce deposits from the unwise, from the ignorant, from the poor, and when those deposits shall have been received in excess of the sum that is placed in trust with the Government of the United States to protect them, there will be a sudden decampment on the part of those bankers, so called.

At least, such I fear will be one of the practical results of allowing banking privileges too freely upon too small amounts to men without responsibility and character. You cannot undertake to pass a measure which shall define the character of the individuals who are to receive these privileges; but they will be open to everybody; and I think we shall degrade the character of our national banks, we shall degrade the character of banking, by allowing the holders of bonds who can accumulate small sums to become bankers recognized by the Government of the United States, and to take the title of national incorporations.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to correct my friend before he sits down. This bill does not interfere with the provision of the banking act which requires all the national banks to have a paid-up capital of at least $100,000, except in places of 6,000 inhabitants and under. The only effect, so far as banks without circulation are concerned, is this: That instead of loaning their money to the Government to the amount of $30,000, and holding Government bonds to the amount of $30,000, they shall be allowed to invest it as they please.

Mr. BAYARD. But still, it places it in the power of a man who can get together the sum of $10,000 to have a national bank of his own.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg pardon.

Mr. BAYARD. Why not?

Mr. SHERMAN. Besides that, they must pay up the capital stock in full. The bill does not change the law in that regard.

Mr. BAYARD. There is nothing in this bill to limit the amount of capital stock.

Mr. SHERMAN. The law to which it is an amendment, the banking act itself, requires that there shall be a capital of at least $100,000, 50 per cent. to be paid down when they commence business, and the remainder in installments of 10 per cent. a month.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the language of this bill in any way bind a company to have a capital stock of a certain amount?

Mr. SHERMAN. The language of the act to which this is an amendment expressly requires it; and if there is any doubt about that there need be none. This bill was not intended to change, in the slightest degree, the national banking act, except as to the amount invested in Government bonds required to be maintained by banks without circulation. I will consent, with great pleasure, to any amendment, in the nature of a proviso, to provide that this act shall not, in any way, affect any provision in regard to the amount of capital stock required until the whole is paid in.

Mr. BAYARD. But this bill increases the number of national banks operating under the present system. There is no doubt about that; and it increases them upon a basis so small that I fear the name of Government bank, which of itself is a title of respect and a creator of confidence in the people——

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. The original banking act makes two requirements for banks that have no circulation; first, that they shall have an actual paid-up stock, I believe, of not less than $50,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not less than $100,000, except in small towns.

Mr. MORTON. Not less than $100,000, except in small towns. That is the first requirement. They must have an actual paid-up capital of not less than $50,000 in any case, and of $100,000 or more in larger towns. Then it provides that, in addition to that, they shall deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury, as a guarantee of their good management and conduct, $30,000 in five-twenty bonds. This bill seeks to relieve these banks from the necessity of thus depositing $30,000 in five-twenty bonds and allows them to deposit $10,000, making that amount sufficient. It is borrowed from the old law of New York which authorized the organization of similar banks upon the deposit of only $5,000 of New York bonds.

Now, what is the advantage of this system of banks over private banks of deposit and discount? There is one very great advantage; and the whole country is interested in the establishment of these banks as contrasted with merely private banks. A great many private banks everywhere are doing business without any actual capital at all—banking entirely upon deposits. That is the case, I was informed last night by the Comptroller of the Currency, with some of the largest private banks in New York. He mentioned names, that I will not give, of banks that are supposed not to have a dollar of capital, but to bank entirely upon their reputation and upon deposits. Those private banks are not subject to examination by anybody. They conduct their business from year to year as private persons. The most of the failures have occurred with banks of that character. There have been very few failures of national banks, either with or without circulation.

Now, these national banks without circulation are required to keep a reserve, just as banks with circulation are required to keep a reserve—I mean on their deposits—25 per cent. in the larger towns, and 15 per cent. in the smaller ones. Private banks are not required to keep a reserve of that kind. They are not required to keep anything as an indemnity, or as a security, or as a fund out of which to pay their depositors in case a stringency comes or a run is made on the banks. Therefore, national banks without circulation are in their nature safer than mere private banks, and it is to the interest of the country to encourage the organization of banks that are liable to be examined five times a year, as these banks are under the law. They are required to make returns from time to time to the Secretary of the Treasury, while private banks are not required to make any returns to anybody. There is another element of safety. This bill is simply intended to relieve these banks from the necessity of depositing $25,000 in five-twenties over and above their capital stock that is paid in. I think the request is reasonable. It is regarded by them as a hardship now to have to invest $30,000 in bonds and deposit them when they have no circulation at all. If they had circulation to be secured, the case would be different.

I have thought since this panic commenced that there ought to be a law—I do not know exactly how it can be done; it ought to be done by the States, at least, if not by Congress—requiring private banks of deposit and discount to have at least a certain amount of actual paid-up capital. Most of the disastrous failures have occurred with houses that were banking entirely upon deposits and upon reputation; and when the time of pressure came, it turned out that they had no actual capital in those banks. The Comptroller of the Currency assures me that the returns of the Treasury Department will show that some of the heaviest banks in the United States do not pay any tax upon their capital. When they are called upon to show what their actual capital is, they have not got any, while at the same time they may have $500,000 or $1,000,000 of deposits.

I present these considerations as a reason why this system of banking should be encouraged instead of discouraged.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to read section 7 of the national banking act, which will still be in force if these banks without circulation are authorized:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That no association shall be organized under this act with a less capital than $100,000, nor in a city whose population exceeds fifty thousand persons with a less capital than $200,000: Provided, That banks with a capital of not less than $50,000 may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed six thousand inhabitants.

So that if this bill passes no bank without circulation can be organized under the national banking act unless it has $100,000 capital in towns with a population between six thousand and fifty thousand, and in cities above fifty thousand it must have $200,000. In towns of six thousand or under it may start with a paid-up capital of $50,000; but even that is contingent upon the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. That section would still be operative.

As I said before, this bill passed the Senate at the last session, and it seemed to me to be unobjectionable. I do not see that there can be any objection to it. If Senators, however, desire to have it go over, I shall not press it now. It is a bill in which I have no special interest except that it seemed desirable to pass it now rather than in the last days of the session. I shall be guided entirely by the view of the Senator from Delaware. If he says he prefers it to go over I will not move to take it up.

Mr. BAYARD. While I was attending to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Ohio it occurred to me that he was following a line of remarks tending to what is a very common error in logic, that two wrongs make one right. He urges this bill because there are abuses under the present system of private banking, which I do not deny and which I recognize most fully, for I fancy there is not a man in this Chamber who has not felt indignant at the frauds that have been perpetrated by the recipients of deposits upon the unhappy victims whose credulity led them to place their money in their hands. During the past year there has been, unfortunately, an immense amount of most reckless speculation by private bankers, and by public bankers too, upon deposits which they had no right to treat otherwise than as their name indicated—moneys placed in trust, to be repaid upon demand, and to be kept for the purposes of those who really owned them, and not a loan to the banker upon which to base his speculations and operations in stocks of every character. The system of private banking upon deposits has been monstrously dishonest and outrageous, and has brought wide-spread misery throughout this country. All that I admit; all that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] himself stated; but I did not understand him to say that the evil was not also coexisting under this banking system; and I do still say, and submit it for the consideration of the Senate, that if you reduce your present banks to banks of the small dimensions which this bill proposes, to wit, banks of $10,000 capital without circulation, they will still be banks of unlimited deposit, and my own fear is that it will bring banking within the hands of a class of men without that pecuniary responsibility which the country demands its banking agents should have; for a man who banks under our law becomes a Government agent; he is invested with Government privileges, and his operations are sheltered by the reputation of the Government of the United States. The fact of a man being able to say that he has a national bank, means that he has something of credit and something of value which invites the confidence of men to deposit their property with him. I am not willing to extend such a privilege so widely as to lead the less astute, the more ignorant class of my fellow-countrymen to deposit their moneys where they will not be secure, having not only the pecuniary responsibility which a large investment in banking capital gives, but the amount of character that in general attends it.

I trust, therefore, sir, that the proposition to allow the creation of banks of deposit with the insignificant capital of $ .0,000 will not be hastily acted upon by the Senate.

That is one feature of the bill; but it not only proposes to create new $10,000 deposit banks without limitation as to their number, but it proposes to allow the banks of a larger amount of capital to diminish it to a minimum of $10,000. The two measures may pass together, but there is certainly nothing in them which requires that they should be acted upon together. The propositions can be entirely distinct. I think they should be entirely distinct; but I believe the operation of diminishing the size of the bank will be less deleterious to the community than to allow the creation of an indefinite number of these small banks.

Mr. BOREMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware says that this bill will allow the creation of banks with $10,000 capital. I do not so understand it. From the reading of the law by the Senator from Ohio, there can be no national bank without a capital of $100,000 paid up, just as in the ordinary State banks where it is established in a city of over six thousand population; and in a town under that a national bank may be established with a capital of $50,000, but that capital must be paid up. That is a very wide distinction. I would not myself vote for the bill if it authorized the establishment of banks with a capital of $10,000. But we have the benefit here of a capital of $100,000 paid up, and then an additional deposit of $10,000 in Government bonds as a security for the depositors, so that the statement of the Senator from Delaware is widely variant from the statement of the Senator from Ohio, and it makes a very material difference in the support of this bill. This does not propose, as I understand it, to allow banks to be established with a capital of $50,000 at all. You establish the banks with $100,000 capital and then bring in this additional security. The old State bank system would leave out this additional security of $10,000 of United States stocks.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. BOREMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish simply to ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, and other gentlemen who differ with me on this point, whether under this bill there is any pledge in the hands of the Government for the defalcations or defaults of these banks than the $10,000 of bonds. Is not that the extent of the pledge which the Government can possibly hold for the creditors?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senator from Delaware that he is mistaken about that. Every bank organized under this act without circulation will have to keep in its vaults a reserve of 25 per cent. in cities and 15 per cent. in the country, and will be required to make the same reports and returns as a bank of issue, and the Comptroller will have the same power over it.

Mr. BAYARD. But here is the point: Suppose the reserve is not kept; suppose the affairs of the bank are conducted in violation of the banking laws of the United States; suppose your inspection shall disclose that fact; I ask you what security have the depositors of the bank beyond the $10,000 of bonds which have been deposited with the United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. If their capital should be diminished below the amount fixed by law, or they violate the law in any particular instance, it is the sworn duty of the Comptroller to have a receiver appointed and close up their affairs.

Mr. BAYARD. What will he receive when appointed? He takes the $10,000 deposited with the Government, and that is all he can find.

Mr. SHERMAN. It would be the same as in regard to a bank with circulation. If a bank is started with circulation, the circulation is secured beyond peradventure; and the same security will exist for the deposits of a bank without circulation as for the deposits of a bank now with circulation. If a bank now with $1,000,000 deposits grossly violates the law under which it was organized, there is no absolute security for the depositor; all you can do is to guard the execution of the law as well as you can by the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. BOREMAN. The bonds are only deposited to secure the circulation, and therefore the depositors are left just as they would be under this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Delaware, if he thinks differently, let him provide a remedy; but the only question in this bill is whether the owners of a bank without circulation shall be required to invest $30,000 or $10,000 in Government securities. If the Senator raises a doubt, or if he, as a lawyer—for I have great respect for his legal ability—will say there is a doubt about it, I would insert a proviso that nothing in this act contained shall relieve a bank without circulation from the provisions of the banking act in regard to capital stock. The seventh section of that act applies to banks without circulation, as I said before. If the Senator really objects to the bill being taken up, and will say so frankly, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not object to taking up the bill, nor do I object to the Senate passing upon it. I have, perhaps at greater length than I intended, expressed some of my objections to it. I am not at all willing to delay the consideration of it just now if the honorable Senator thinks it important to pass it. I make no motion to postpone; I am ready to vote upon it. I have given reasons, which were in some degree more or less satisfactory to myself, why I shall not support it. I cannot see still how the diminution of this deposit of Government bonds does not decrease the amount of security of the creditors of the bank. If the Comptroller of the Currency were to find that a bank had violated the banking law in many of its particulars—not keeping the proper reserve, not complying with the conditions of the act in any other way—and the Comptroller discovered this, I should suppose the deposit in his hands might be applied to the payment of the debts of the bank—not simply the circulation but all its liabilities. Such I believe is at least the current idea of the people, that this deposit of bonds under the national-bank system gives a security and a credit to the bank conducting its operations under the national system.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to make just one remark. The depositors in a private bank have no security except in the financial ability of the men who own the bank. They may be men of fortune or they may not be.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator speaks of individual bankers?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir. In one of these national banks they are required to furnish a security in advance to the depositors of $100,000 of paid-up capital; in a private bank they are not; and the bank examiner comes around several times a year and examines the condition of the national bank to find whether this capital is maintained there of at least $100,000—it may be $500,000—whatever the contract of the bank with the Government determines, whatever they determine to start out with; but in a private bank there is no such thing as a paid-up capital. After men start the bank they may draw out every cent they put in and bank entirely on deposits, as a great many of them do; and there is where the most disastrous failures have come. The paid-up capital required of these banks is intended to be the security of the depositors. There are repeated examinations for the purpose of showing that that capital is maintained there intact and that the bank is well managed. I regard these things as a great security for the depositors over an ordinary private bank.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I beg to say a word before the vote is taken. I concur most heartily in what has been said in opposition to private banks. They ought to be regarded as a curse to the country rather than a blessing. The national banks without issue have the advantage, in the first place, of having the sanction of the Government. The public are interested in them because of the security that they afford to the depositor. This proposition, as I understand it, is to reduce the security that the public have in banks of the character under consideration.

Now, let us see how a bank of this kind operates. By the law, in a small town a national bank may be created with $50,000 capital, and the whole amount of stock must be paid in. Thereupon the corporation has the right to receive deposits and to proceed with the regular business of banking, except that they cannot issue notes; but they may receive deposits, and may receive them to any amount.

Under the national banking system now, what security has the depositor? First, he has the security of the integrity of the board of directors and the officers of the bank; next, he has the security of the paid-up capital; next, he has the reserve of 15 per cent. in greenbacks constantly kept on hand; next, he has the security of the amount of national bonds which the bank is required to keep on deposit with the Government, the minimum amount of which now is $30,000. This affords a great and important advantage to the public. I understand that this proposition is to reduce that amount to $10,000, so that a bank not of issue may proceed to business with a deposit of $10,000 of Government bonds in the Treasury instead of $30,000, thus cutting down the security to the public. Now, what is the motive for that? What reasonable demand is there on the part of those who desire to engage in the business of banking that this security to the public, to the depositors, should thus be cut down?

It is said that the present requirement of the law is unreasonable, and that is the only consideration I have heard yet suggested for it. Now, sir, I insist that that suggestion is unfounded; that the requirement is not unreasonable; that, on the contrary, so far from being unreasonable, it would be reasonable on the part of the Government, in behalf of the public good, to require a larger deposit of bonds when such privileges are granted. Why? The banker, while these bonds are on deposit with the Government, has not a dead investment. Twice a year he receives his interest at the rate of 5 or 6 per cent. on the amount of his bond deposit with the Government, and, in view of the present monetary condition of the country, and the condition that it has been in since the close of the war, every one of these bankers, from one end of the country to the other, has realized from 1 to 1½ or 2 per cent. profit on the money they bank upon, the deposits that they receive, and they have actually paid the legal rate of interest in many instances to depositors, and then made large incomes by reason of the deposits placed with them.

The point I rose to make is that this is a proposition to reduce the security to the public, to reduce the security to the depositor, and to that extent to do that much injury to the business of the country; to that extent to detract from the worth of the national banking system; to that extent to cut down the security that is provided by the national banking law. I am therefore opposed to it. The demand is unnecessary, and it is unreasonable, because the banker who desires to bank in this manner has all the reasonable profit that he ought to command.

I have another objection which I will mention, but one which I will not enlarge upon at this moment, and that is this: I think it is very manifest, not only from what we have witnessed here in the Senate to-day and during the present session of Congress, but also from what we see manifested in the newspapers, that there is to be a decided change in the monetary system of the country. I trust there will be; for while I believe that the national banks have been a great blessing to the country, while they have contributed very much to promote the industrial interests of the country, I think the time has come when there must be a change, and when a different system of banking in this country must be adopted; and if that is so it seems to me that it is exceedingly unwise to burden the country with a great number of banks which, we are told, will be created if this measure shall pass. I trust, sir, that the bill will not pass.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to say just one thing in reply to my friend from North Carolina. He says that this is designed to take away the security of the depositors.

Mr. MERRIMON. My friend misunderstood me. The purpose of it is to cut down the security.

Mr. MORTON. I said to take away—the same thing in substance—to cut down the security by the amount of $20,000. Now the difference between requiring a bank with circulation to deposit bonds in the Treasury of the United States, and one not of circulation, is a very wide one. It does not pay bankers or business men to invest their money in five-twenty bonds unless they are prepared to retire from business. Those who organize banks of circulation cannot afford to invest their money in bonds, and deposit them in the Treasury of the United States, and receive simply the interest upon those bonds. Business men cannot afford that. They are compensated, however, for that by receiving a certain amount of circulation in return—90 per cent. of the face of the bonds; but these banks without circulation deposit their bonds without receiving any circulation in return from the Government of the United States. I understand that the bonds deposited in the Treasury are a guarantee for the good management, the honest conduct, of the bank, and the depositors are intended to be secured by the amount of paid-up stock in the bank, which an examination requires to be kept there, and by the reserve in greenbacks which these banks are required to keep.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have some knowledge, Mr. President, of the operations of the national banking law. As I understand it, in this case the depositor has the security of the paid-up capital; not only that, he has the security of the reserve of 15 per cent.; and not only that, he has the additional security of this deposit of $30,000 of the bonds of the United States with the Government. That deposit is not simply a guarantee for the good management of the bank, but it is a security for the depositors, for the creditors of the bank, if it shall fail. It is true, indeed, such a bank does not have the benefit of any issue, but it gets the benefit of the sanction of the Government for its banking institution, and that is a great deal. The public gets the security of these indemnities to those who shall deal with this bank, and that is a very great one; and that is what gives character and standing to this system, and what makes it advantageous to the public over the system of private banking. It is that which tends to destroy a common nuisance from one end of the land to the other.

But my friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] says that business men cannot afford to invest their money in the bonds if such a large amount be required to be deposited with the Government. With all respect to him I deny the fact. As I said a moment ago, these bonds are not a dead investment. It is true they are deposited with the Government, and they are locked up; but twice a year the owner receives his interest, 5 or 6 per cent. in gold, from the Government upon these very bonds that are deposited as a security. By virtue of the advantages that he derives from the banking law he receives deposits, as many as he can get. There is no limitation to that. He may receive fifty thousand dollars in deposits, one hundred thousand, two hundred thousand, five hundred thousand, or one million dollars; and then he lends that money, not at the interest prescribed by the banking law of the United States or by the laws of the several States, but he receives the rate that is stipulated for when he lends the money; and what is that? Seldom if ever less than 1 per cent. a month, oftener 1½ or 2 per cent. And yet we are told that this requirement of a deposit of $30,000 in bonds with the Government is not reasonable. Very often such enormous rates of interest are charged that persons having the benefit of this banking system will go so far as to pay interest on deposits; and that has led to many of the evils that have come upon the country recently during the panic we are now passing through.

The point I make is this: I repeat, why shall this security to the public be cut down from $30,000 to $10,000? Every one who desires to invest his money in a bank of this character, if he is fit to be a banker at all, will receive large profits from his bank in addition to receiving from 5 to 6 per cent. on the bonds that he has deposited with the Government; and, so far from being willing to cut down this security to the public, I say it might be well for the Senate to consider whether we should not require additional and higher security, say one hundred thousand dollars. If that were done it would tend to strengthen this system of banking; it would tend to encourage public confidence in it; it would tend further to secure the public, and without detriment to the banker; for, be assured, money always takes care of itself; the banking community always take care of themselves, and legislation is only necessary to protect the people against loss from those who engage in such pursuits.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, it would appear that there is a greater diversity of opinion in the Senate as to the propriety of this bill than was certainly indicated in the early stages of it; and as I apprehend we can hardly expect to get a vote this day, and to leave the matter precisely where it is in the order of business, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. That leaves the resolution pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the adoption of the substitute offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] for the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 15, 1873.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of Friday last was read.

MEMBER SWORN IN.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I rise to a question of the highest privilege. Mr. Samuel F. Hersey, member-elect from the fourth district of Maine, is present, and I ask that he be sworn in.

Mr. HERSEY appeared and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. RANSIER. I rise to a correction of the Journal. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that on Friday last, on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] touching the investigation ordered by the House on the letter of the Secretary of War in relation to General Howard, I voted "no," and I find myself recorded as having voted "ay." I ask that the Journal be corrected.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected accordingly.

Mr. McFADDEN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 767) to authorize the county commissioners of Thurston County, in Washington Territory, to issue bonds for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Budd's Inlet (Puget Sound) to intersect the North Pacific Railroad at or near Terrino; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

CONVERTIBLE BONDS AND NATIONAL BANK NOTES.

Mr. CHAFFEE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 768) to provide for the issue of convertible bonds and national bank notes, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

PEMBINA TERRITORY.

Mr. ARMSTRONG introduced a bill (H. R. No. 769) to establish the Territory of Pembina and to provide a temporary government therefor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS ON FORT RANDALL RESERVATION.

Mr. ARMSTRONG also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 770) for the relief of certain settlers on Fort Randall military reservation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RE-APPORTIONMENT OF LEGISLATURE OF IDAHO.

Mr. HAILEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 771) authorizing the governor of Idaho to re-apportion the members of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Idaho, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

JOINT ENTRY BY PRE-EMPTION SETTLERS.

Mr. HAILEY also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 772) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing joint entry by pre-emption settlers, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

FORT SANDERS MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. STEELE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 773) to reduce the area of the military reservation of Fort Sanders and providing for the survey of said reservation as reduced; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LANDS IN WYOMING.

Mr. STEELE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 774) to amend an act entitled "An act to withdraw from settlement and sale a certain section of land in Wyoming Territory," approved May 3, 1872; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS EASTERN BRANCH OF THE POTOMAC.

Mr. CHIPMAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 775) to authorize the construction of a substantial iron or masonry bridge across the eastern branch of the Potomac, at or near the present Anacostia Bridge; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CHIPMAN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 776) in aid of the public schools in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

METROPOLITAN POLICE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CHIPMAN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 777) to amend and consolidate the several acts establishing and relating to the Metropolitan Police of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

STEAM RAILROADS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CHIPMAN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 778) for a commission to regulate the tracks and depots of steam railways within the city of Washington; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

RICHARD OULAHAN.

Mr. CHIPMAN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 779) for the relief of Richard Oulahan, late lieutenant of the One hundred and sixty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of States and Territories having been concluded, the Chair will now recognize gentlemen who have been omitted, or were absent when their States were called, for the introduction for reference of bills and joint resolutions.

COMPENSATION OF MARSHALS AND CLERKS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 780) requiring the United States marshals and clerks of the United States circuit and district courts who have received fees and emoluments in excess of their legal compensation to deposit the same with the Treasurer of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

RICHARD W. MEADE.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 781) for the relief of the heirs of Richard W. Meade; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

OFFICERS AND CREW OF THE WYOMING.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 782) for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States ship Wyoming; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY L. RYDER.

Mr. SESSIONS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 783) to give Henry L. Ryder a pension; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF NORTHERN AND NORTHWESTERN FRONTIER.

Mr. FOSTER (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 784) to provide for the better protection of the northern and northwestern frontier, and to facilitate commerce and diminish the expense of the exchanges between States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

SEA-BOARD AND ROANOKE RAILROAD.

Mr. KELLOGG introduced a bill (H. R. No. 785) for the relief of the Sea-board and Roanoke Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

J. L. JONES.

Mr. STONE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 786) for the payment of J. L. Jones for the use of his patent by the Government; which was read a first and second time, referred, with the accompanying documents, to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT AUSTIN, TEXAS.

Mr. HANCOCK introduced a bill (H. R. No. 787) to provide a building for the use of the district and circuit courts of the United States, post-office and internal-revenue offices, at Austin, Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

HOME MANUFACTURE OF TOBACCO.

Mr. WHITEHEAD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 788) to encourage the home manufacture of tobacco; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

EXEMPTION OF APPLE BRANDY FROM TAXATION.

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 789) removing all internal taxes from apple brandy manufactured in the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of Dr. Middleton Goldsmith and Henry Chase, centennial commissioners for Vermont; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration, and ordered to be printed.

MAIL MATTER OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. KASSON. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Postmaster of the House of Representatives be instructed to receive from the city postmaster, from time to time, all printed matter posted there with insufficient stamps thereon, so far as posted by Members and Delegates of this House.

Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which largely concerns the convenience of members. I have been informed this morning by our deputy city postmaster that there are now detained at the city post-office several packages of printed matter mailed by members of this House with insufficient stamps. This matter, which includes particularly the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, has been mailed mostly, not at our House post-office, but from our respective lodgings and hotels. Accumulations of such matter are usually sold, stamps and all, once in three days for waste paper. These packages now remaining there represent a considerable amount of money in stamps; and the object of this resolution is to enable our postmaster to reclaim them and to enable the members who have sent them to supply the deficiency of stamps.

Mr. DAWES. Is there any law for selling such matter?

Mr. KASSON. There is a law for selling it, but I think the time that the matter is allowed to accumulate is fixed under instructions of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Does this resolution propose a change in the law?

Mr. KASSON. No, sir.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that he modify the resolution so as to provide that such mail matter be sent to the place of its destination.

Mr. KASSON. That would require legislation. It is not within the power of this House, acting alone, and would take time. The object of the resolution is to enable the Postmaster of the House to bring back this matter under our supervision, so that it may be sufficiently stamped.

Mr. ELDREDGE. How is this matter to be identified as belonging to particular members? Their names are no longer upon the envelopes, as was the case before the franking privilege was abolished.

Mr. KASSON. In many instances the names are put on the wrappers, and in other instances the character of the contents appears, so that it is recognized as coming from members of Congress. Gentlemen will at once see the importance of investing our Postmaster with a little discretion in this matter, where gentlemen have not put their names on packages.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman whether our Postmaster here, in the discharge of his duty, ought not to detain here all matter of that class not sufficiently paid by stamps? If the matter passes from this office, I submit whether we have any more right to detain it in this city than at any other point to which it might be sent.

Mr. KASSON. The Postmaster of the House does detain such matter here as far as possible; but much of this matter has been mailed from our rooms without passing through the hands of the Postmaster of the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the resolution will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection.

STAMP-TAX ON MEDICINAL PREPARATIONS.

Mr. MYERS, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of over three thousand druggists, pharmaceutists, and manufacturing chemists of the United States, from 275 cities and towns of all the States and Territories, asking a repeal of the stamp-tax on medicinal preparations, or such modification of the law as will confine said tax to patent or proprietary medicines; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

RETIRED NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. MYERS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 790) to establish the rank and pay of certain retired officers of the Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JUDGE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, ALABAMA.

Mr. E. R. HOAR, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is requisite concerning the official conduct of the judge of the United States district court for the district of Alabama; and especially whether said judge has held terms of his court required by law; whether he has continuously and persistently absented himself from the said State; and whether his acts and omissions in his office of judge have been such as in any degree to deprive the people of that State of the benefit of a district court therein, and amount to a denial of justice.

REPEAL OF THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Speaker, the Judiciary Committee have instructed me to report a bill to provide for the repeal of the law commonly called the bankrupt law; and as preliminary to the motion which I desire to submit to this House for a suspension of the rules, I ask the privilege of briefly explaining the general scope, object, and purpose of the bill, and the views entertained by the committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York whether he proposes to allow any debate on the other side? If not, then I object to any debate on his part.

Mr. TREMAIN. As to whether my statement will be followed by debate will be governed by the rules of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I wish to have an understanding on that point. The gentleman now proposes to make a speech in advance of the introduction of his bill, and I object to any debate on his part upon the motion to suspend the rules, unless there is some understanding on the subject that debate shall be allowed on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to object, as the motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

Mr. TREMAIN. Then I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of receiving and putting on its passage the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law, which I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reports from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill which the Clerk will read, and moves that the rules be suspended and the bill passed.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from New York to frame his motion so as to suspend the rules and take up the bill for consideration. He can move to suspend the rules at any time in a later stage and pass the bill.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, that was the distinct understanding; that was the motion to be made—to suspend the rules only for the purpose of taking the bill up for consideration.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If that motion is carried will it not bring this subject of repealing the bankrupt law before the House so it will be put in the front of everything else, and so that nothing else can be done or reached until it has been disposed of?

The SPEAKER. Necessarily, if the House suspends the rules, nothing else will be in order until it is disposed of.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to say a word.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I hope the gentleman from New York will take the sense of the House on his original motion, for I believe the House is ready to pass the bill at once repealing the bankrupt law.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the reading of the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to say to the House that while I did not wish to interrupt——

Mr. PARSONS. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. That is the first thing in order, before any remarks are in order; and the Clerk will read the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.]

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. No. 792) to repeal an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto.

The first section provides that an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867; and an act entitled "An act in amendment of an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867,'" approved July 27, 1868; and an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867,'" approved June 30, 1870; and an act entitled "An act in amendment of an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy in the United States,'" approved July 14, 1870; and an act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867," approved February 13, 1873, and all other laws and parts of laws amendatory of said first-named act, and all amendments thereto, be repealed.

The second section provides that in all cases of bankruptcy now pending, whether an adjudication of bankruptcy has been decreed or not, it shall also be lawful for a majority in value of the creditors whose claims have been proved, or whose claims are provable at any meeting of creditors called as is provided for in said act, or at any adjourned meeting thereof, to determine and resolve by whom, and in what manner, and upon what terms and conditions, the estate of the bankrupt shall be managed, administered, controlled, disposed of, wound up, and distributed, and also to adopt such agreement or plan for the settlement, compromise, extension, composition of the claims against the estate and the bankrupt, or for the division of the assets or any portion thereof among the creditors in money or property, real or personal, as they may deem expedient; and upon such resolution or resolutions being properly certified and reported to the court, they shall forthwith be confirmed and made orders of the court in that case, and become binding upon all the creditors of the said estate and bankrupt, and it shall be the duty of the court to make all necessary orders and decrees to carry the same into effect. It also provides that in all such cases now pending, whether an adjudication has been decreed or not, upon the presentation to the court having jurisdiction thereof by the debtor, or any one or more of his creditors, of a petition alleging an agreement for a settlement, compromise, extension, or composition of the claims against the said debtor, or for the division of the assets or any portion thereof among the creditors, in money or property, real or personal, or for the management, administration, or winding up of the estate in any manner, to which a majority in value of the creditors whose claims have been proved, or whose claims are provable, shall have assented in writing at any time subsequent to the alleged act of bankruptcy or to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, it shall be the duty of the court having jurisdiction, upon due proof of its execution, forthwith to carry the same into effect by all necessary orders and decrees, and such agreement shall be valid and binding upon all the creditors of the bankrupt or alleged bankrupt, and the estate shall thereafter be administered and wound up in pursuance of the terms and provisions of such agreement.

The third section provides that upon the confirmation of the resolutions as above provided for, or the making of due proof of such agreement, order, and decree, it shall be the duty of the debtor, or the marshal, or assignee, or other person who may then have custody of the estate, to convey by proper assurances of title, transfer, and deliver the same to the person or persons entitled to receive the same under and by virtue of the said resolutions, or of the provisions of said agreement; who shall, upon such conveyance and transfer, have and hold the same in the same manner, and with the same powers and rights, as the bankrupt or alleged bankrupt would have had and held the same if no proceeding in bankruptcy had been taken; or as the assignee in bankruptcy would have done if such resolutions had not been adopted, or if such agreement had not been made, subject only to the terms and conditions of said resolutions or agreement, as the case may be; and if such resolutions or agreement shall so provide, the debtor shall retain or receive the estate, or any part thereof, in the manner and upon the terms provided in said resolutions or agreement. The title and powers of the person or persons authorized by the said resolutions or said agreement to receive the estate shall vest and take effect immediately upon the adoption of such resolutions, or the filing in court of such agreement, as the case may be. Due proof of the execution of such agreement, to entitle the applicant to have such order made, shall consist in the production thereof to the proper court, and the affidavit of one or more persons, deposing to the execution thereof by the persons whose names are thereto subscribed, and to the fact that the creditors whose names are signed thereto are a majority in value, as aforesaid, of all the creditors of the bankrupt, or alleged bankrupt, whose debts have been proved, or are provable; and such agreement, with the proof thereof, shall be filed in said court; provided, however, that such decree may be vacated and set aside if it shall be made to appear that a majority in value, as aforesaid, have not signed said agreement. The person or persons appointed by such resolutions or agreement to administer the estate may from time to time apply to the court for such orders and directions as may be necessary to carry into effect the resolutions or agreement, and for the protection and administration of the estate. And the said resolutions or agreement, and any orders of the court in relation thereto, shall be deemed proceedings in bankruptcy under this act, and shall supersede all other proceedings thereunder; but the debtor shall be subject to examination, as provided by the twenty-sixth section of the act hereby repealed, whenever required by the person or persons appointed to administer the estate; and if the resolutions or agreement do not provide for a release or discharge of the debtor, the bankrupt shall have the right to apply for and obtain a discharge in the same manner, and with the same effect, as if all the proceedings had continued in the manner provided in the other sections of said act.

The fourth section provides that the creditors who shall not have signed such agreement shall be entitled to all the benefits and be subject to all the provisions of said resolutions or agreement in the same manner and with the same effect as the creditors who have signed the same, and that the provisions of such resolutions or agreement shall inure equally to the benefit of all the creditors of such bankrupt or alleged bankrupt, and that the rights of all creditors holding valid liens or security, and the rights of separate and partnership creditors of such bankrupt or alleged bankrupt, shall also be preserved and protected.

The fifth section provides that the general superintendence of the circuit court in cases of bankruptcy provided for in the second section of the act may be exercised upon appeal from any order or decree of the district court, and that an appeal may also be taken in any case involving more than $2,000 from any order or decree of the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States in the manner now provided by law.

The sixth section repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provision of the act; but provides that in all cases now pending in any of the courts of the United States, the same proceedings shall be had as if the act had not been passed, except in the special cases provided for in the act; and it provides further, that nothing contained in the act shall be deemed to affect or impair any act done or right created under the provisions of the act or acts repealed.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York one question. Does not this bill authorize a majority of the creditors to distribute the estate among themselves to the exclusion of the minority?

Mr. TREMAIN. Not at all; the property is to be divided equally among the creditors.

Mr. MAYNARD. This is too important a bill to pass without inquiry or examination.

Mr. TREMAIN. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] I modify my motion. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose of bringing the bill before the House for consideration.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman to allow me fifteen minutes before he makes that motion, to call the attention of the House to a matter which the Committee on Ways and Means deem of great importance.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If the gentleman from New York will yield to me, and if it be in order, I will move to amend his motion so as to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules is not amendable.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Not if the gentleman yields to me for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York can modify his motion and move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I have no desire to interfere with the gentleman's measure at all, but if he proposes to bring it before the House for discussion, of course it will take up the whole day; and I wish very much, as the organ of the Committee on Ways and Means, to get the attention of the House on a measure which they deem of the utmost importance, to-day.

Mr. TREMAIN. I had hoped that I might be permitted briefly to explain the bill, and that the minority of the committee might be permitted either to have read from the desk a minority report or to explain their views without prejudice to the motion I have made; but I am quite unwilling, as a matter of courtesy, to sacrifice the substantial right of having the House brought directly to the question to-day on the passage of this bill, because I believe the country demands immediate relief. Unless some arrangement can be made by unanimous consent whereby some time, say half an hour, shall be allowed to each side to present their views upon the bill, I shall be under the necessity of insisting on my original motion that the rules be suspended so as to pass the bill.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I hope my friend from New York will allow me to make a suggestion; and it is that he ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed and be made the special order for to-morrow after the morning hour; or if he cannot get unanimous consent for that purpose, he might move to suspend the rules so as to make it the special order for to-morrow after the morning hour, and meanwhile it may be printed.

Mr. DAWES. And I suggest to the gentleman that he fix the time that shall be allowed for its consideration—say one hour or two hours, just as he pleases; but fix some time during which it shall be considered, and then bring the House to a vote upon it.

Mr. TREMAIN. I am willing to adopt that suggestion if it can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAWES. If not, you can get a two-thirds vote.

Mr. SENER. Will the bill be open to amendments at that time?

The SPEAKER. That depends on the gentleman who has charge of it.

Mr. SENER. I would like to ask the gentleman that question.

Mr. TREMAIN. I think the debate had better be limited to one hour on each side, and then, I suppose, the bill will be subject to the general rules in regard to amendments.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman desires to leave the bill open for amendment, of course he will take no action preventing amendments; but if he desires to bring the House to a direct vote on the bill he will enter a motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. TREMAIN. I desire a direct vote on the bill, and will therefore move to recommit it. I am willing, however, that in the mean time there may be either one or two hours allowed for debate, as may be most agreeable to the House. It is suggested to me that one hour be allowed for and one hour against the bill, and that the speeches be limited to fifteen minutes, and that at the end of that time the vote shall be taken upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the bill be printed, and that the rules be suspended so as to make it the special order for to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal; that the debate be limited to two hours; that speeches shall be of not more than fifteen minutes each, with the understanding that a motion to recommit is pending.

Mr. SENER. That would cut off amendments?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will not that postpone the salary bill if it should not be disposed of in the mean time?

The SPEAKER. Of course; this bill would take precedence of all other business.

Mr. HOLMAN. Give this the preference of that?

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. MONROE. Does this supersede the morning hour to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour would come up immediately afterward, although at a somewhat late period of the day, if nothing else of higher privilege intervenes.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. TREMAIN; and upon a division there were—ayes 147, noes 39.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. CREAMER called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 34 in the affirmative.

Mr. KILLINGER called for a count on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint tellers, as being the quickest way to dispose of the question.

Mr. SCOFIELD and Mr. SPEER were appointed tellers.

The House again divided on ordering the yeas and nays; and the tellers reported that there were 30 in the affirmative, noes not counted.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion of Mr. TREMAIN was accordingly agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

REVISION OF ESTIMATES.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to make a report, the character of which I desire to state to the House. The Secretary of the Treasury has communicated to the Committee on Ways and Means, in addition to such official communication as has been made to the House, what he deems to be a pressing and immediate necessity for an increase in taxation to the amount of about $40,000,000. In view of the importance of this recommendation, and the serious character of it, the Committee on Ways and Means, after due consideration, instructed me to report to the House the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended in an official letter to the Committee on Ways and Means an increase in certain customs duties and internal taxation: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the heads of the several Departments be instructed to revise their estimates of expenditures for the next fiscal year with the view, in the changed condition of the country, to a reduction therein, and report the same to this House, to the end that all possible effort at reduction be exhausted before new burdens be imposed upon the people.

After the Committee on Ways and Means had instructed me to make this report, it came to their knowledge that the Committee on Appropriations had been considering the same matter, as the field of jurisdiction was somewhat concurrent, inasmuch as the ways and means were exclusively under the jurisdiction of one committee and the appropriations under that of another. But still the appropriations might depend also in a great measure upon the ways and means. The two committees upon conference have come to an agreement that will secure the joint aid and co-operation of those committees in a resolution that will be offered to the House by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. GARFIELD,] if I may be allowed to yield the floor to him for that purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it appears that since the estimates of appropriations required for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, which have been laid before the House, were made by the several Departments of the Government, the country had entered upon a period of great financial embarrassment, accompanied by a shrinkage of values and a heavy falling off in the revenues; and whereas in the judgment of this House the foregoing facts make it the duty of Congress to reduce the expenditures to the lowest point consistent with the necessities of the Government: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause a revision of said estimates to be made by the several Executive Departments, and cause a report to be made to the House, if possible, as early as the 5th of January next, setting forth in detail what public expenditures for the current fiscal year, and what estimates for the next fiscal year, can be reduced, and the amount of such reduction, without serious detriment to the public service.

If the House will indulge me for a moment, I will state the simple reason for requesting this action which is recited in the preamble to the resolution, but which may not have caught the attention of the House. Nearly all the estimates that are now before the House in the form of the Book of Estimates were made up in the months of August and September last, before the financial troubles which have come upon the country had begun to be felt. It is believed by the Committee on Appropriations that in view of the shrinkage of values, and the great embarrassments the country labors under in consequence thereof, these Departments might be able to make such retrenchments and such reduction in their estimates as would very considerably reduce the necessity for any increase in taxation. We do not suppose that there can be a reduction to the extent of $42,000,000. But whatever it can be, we ought to have the help of all the Departments in suggesting the places where such reduction can be made.

If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has any amendment to propose, I will yield to him for that purpose; if not, then I will ask the House to pass the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to add to the preamble of this resolution the preamble of the resolution which I read, as follows:

And whereas the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended, in an official letter to the Committee on Ways and Means, an increase in certain customs duties and internal taxation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I accept the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] how much he believes the estimates can be reduced, if they have been properly made up to carry out existing laws?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is impossible for me to answer that question at this stage of the session. I only know that in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and it was also noticed in the message of the President, reference is made to the fact that a large number of public buildings were authorized by the last Congress. The work on them has not yet been commenced. It is suggested that if work shall be suspended, or rather if it be not begun on them, a considerable sum, perhaps amounting to three or four million dollars, could be covered back into the Treasury from that source; and the same, perhaps, in regard to fortifications and the improvement of rivers and harbors. I am able to see a number of places where it seems to me reductions may be made without damage to the public service, even in expenditures for the current year, and still more in the estimates for the next fiscal year.

Gentlemen will notice that the total amount of the estimates for the next fiscal year is $319,000,000, about $15,000,000 more than the estimates for the last year.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think it will be possible to cut down the estimates to the extent of $40,000,000, or $42,000,000, but an effort to cut them down is incumbent upon every branch of the public service. In addition to what my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has stated, there is an estimate of either $12,000,000 or $14,000,000 for fortifications, an estimate made at a time when the Department making it felt that the resources of the Government would justify that large expenditure. I have reason to believe that that very Department is now convinced, as much as anybody else, that the present exigency justifies a great reduction in that estimate. I believe that many of the Departments are feeling a desire to co-operate with these two committees in the effort to show to the country that the Government, as well as every prudent individual, in his own business affairs, is in these times willing to cut off every possible expenditure and reduce the expenses of the public service according to the demands of the most rigid economy, and this before we shall undertake to revive any taxes that have been removed, or to impose any new taxes upon the industries of the country.

If in the end we should be obliged to fall back upon additional taxation after we have shown the country our disposition to cut off every redundant expenditure, whatever it may be, and to make every possible reduction of salaries under our jurisdiction, we can then address ourselves to the work of increasing taxation, if need be, to maintain the credit of the country abroad, and to meet the demands for current expenses at home.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] allow me one word?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, there is the gravest apprehension in the country as to this matter of increased taxation. Every member here who has any correspondence from home must know that this apprehension exists. Speculation is already rife as to what we shall do on this subject. While I shall do all in my little power to assist in any measure of economy which may come from either of these committees, I think it is due to our people at home—to our merchants and traders—that something definite should be said by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means as to the articles that are to be taxed, (if we must resort to additional taxation,) and if possible the rate of taxation. And since the gentleman has mentioned the shrinkage of values, I think he should state whether there is any intention to enlarge the volume of the currency so as, if possible, to avoid this shrinkage of values. Something is due from the "Chancellor of the Exchequer" on this subject. I believe everybody would be glad to hear from him candidly and frankly, so that no man may be enabled to indulge in speculation at the public expense.

Mr. DAWES. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee on Ways and Means has gone into the public prints.

Mr. COX. I did not know that.

Mr. DAWES. That letter conveys to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] all the information that I think he desires—certainly all that I shall feel at liberty to extend to him. The Committee on Ways and Means fully appreciate the difficulties surrounding this subject and the effect of its agitation upon trade. I may venture the remark (because the letter is in print) that a part of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury is to increase taxation upon whisky. In consequence of this recommendation all the whisky stills in the country will within three days of this time be working night and day. There is no branch of industry which this proposition can reach, directly or indirectly, that is not seriously affected in all views by this suggestion of increased taxation.

Still, Mr. Speaker, it is only after all other measures shall have failed that additional taxation should be resorted to; and if such measures should fail, I have no doubt we shall have the co-operation of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] and of the gentlemen with whom he is associated, in any proper effort to maintain the credit of this country abroad and to meet its necessary expenses at home. I know of no one who in the conduct of public affairs desires anything else. Although urged to take up and pass before the holidays bills for raising $42,000,000 by increased taxation, both these committees felt that it was their duty first to ask Congress to make this appeal to the heads of Departments, so that when we return in January we can see whether it is within the possibilities to refrain from the administration of this extreme medicine.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am a practical man and generally look to practical results. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury recommends (I suppose it is no secret) that there should be a reimposition of the duty on tea and coffee, and increased taxation upon whisky and tobacco.

Mr. DAWES. Not on those alone.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; but those only concern especially my present remarks. If this additional taxation is to be imposed it should be done instantly; otherwise it will yield no revenue, because of the immense amount of whisky that would be distilled and put on the market before this tax will be imposed if we wait for the estimates called for by this resolution. Large quantities of tobacco would be forced into consumption, or into such hands as would enable it to escape taxation. More than that, merchants would import, before our taxation could go into operation, all the tea and coffee that would be wanted for a year to come; so that we should have raised the prices of tea and coffee, whisky and tobacco, for the benefit of the persons holding those commodities, without any aid to the revenue. Therefore, if we are to have new taxation in respect to these articles, it should be imposed at once. It will not do to wait to see whether three, four, or five million dollars cannot be saved by cutting down the estimates of the Departments. I do not believe that the actual reduction to be reached in this way can amount to $5,000,000; because, while the estimates for public buildings, for rivers and harbors, and for fortifications are very large, yet it was not understood or believed by the heads of the Departments when they made those estimates that all those appropriations were to be made. They only made the estimates to carry out the provisions of existing law, leaving Congress to determine what should be appropriated. So I do not believe we would get eight or ten millions actual reduction. And while we are waiting to get the statistics of those reductions the whole benefit of taxation will be taken away from us by the importation or production of all of the articles upon which taxes are expected to be raised.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to ask my colleague if he means to suggest the propriety of at once imposing such taxes?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. At once if at all; but I will come to that in a moment. So that all of the advantage of such taxation will be taken away from the Government and simply put into the pockets of the owners of the produce or of the imported goods to enhance the prices to the consumers. Therefore, I wonder why the chairman of Ways and Means has not made another suggestion to the House and the country, and that is that we provide for this threatened deficit by reducing the interest on the public debt by substituting non-paying interest notes, which the people demand, for high-paying interest bonds which are abroad in Europe. That will be an immediate relief, in my judgment, relieving us in very many ways; and I think the people demand—the situation of the country demands, such a measure instead of a measure simply of finding out how few millions can be saved by paring here and there the estimates of the Departments, or by imposing taxes which will be fruitless. Nay, more, sir; I think that all of this taxation, and that especially this proposition to delay while our country is suffering, will only result to the good of those who desire a shrinkage of all values, which only redounds to the creditor interest by going back to that most mischievous of all financial dogmas, in my understanding, and that is the idea of a currency based on specie payments.

I want our currency to be as good as specie—ay, and better too. Any idea of making specie payment for it is a delusion and a snare. There never was specie payment in this country, and there never will be; because in any system of banking we ever had, or ever was proposed, whenever specie was called for to an amount of five millions, then the banks shut down on specie, and ruin, financially and commercially, always followed. Even in specie-paying England, as it is called, whenever there is any demand for specie the rates of interest are run up by the Bank of England until merchants and all business men are ruined, and then when the bank can run interest no further, it asks the government to allow it to suspend and leave its notes a legal-tender currency. This always is the relief sought from the evils of a specie currency. I hope, therefore, to hear from the learned chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, as the result of the deliberations of that committee, some other measure of relief proposed, such as a loan at a low rate of interest convertible and reconvertible into "greenbacks" or non-interest-bearing notes, so that we can pare down or cut down our high rates of interest at home and abroad.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I will not antagonize my colleague at this time on the question whether it be better to "pare down," as he calls it, public expenditures or to trust ourselves to a reduction of expenditures, or to meet extravagant and unnecessary ones by issuing new notes of indebtedness, even if we can do it at a lower rate of interest. At the proper time I shall have no hesitancy even in trying to meet my distinguished colleague before this House and the country on the propriety of the two measures. For, sir, whether it be little or much, I believe the people of this country will call on this House to reduce our expenditures every dollar, whether it be called "paring down" or not, before we shall be permitted by them to issue any new notes to meet our current expenses. There could be no more fatal blow to the credit of this country abroad and the value of its bonds in the markets of the world than the suggestion from any proper authority, even with the weight of my colleague here in this House, that it is necessary for us, and we choose that course, instead of putting ourselves upon the most rigid possible economy, to borrow money to meet our current expenses, whatever may be the rate of interest. I know it may not be much—I fear, sir, it may not be much—I do not know, but I fear it may not be much; but could I have my own way about it the knife would go into that Book of Estimates, and with the assurance on my part it would not impair the public confidence one atom, until the difference between current receipts and current expenditures should no longer exist.

Sir, the Book of Estimates is a marvel to me. When I take up that broad book, so unlike that I used to carry under my arm, it is most unintelligible to me. The only thing about it I can realize and understand is that year after year the estimates are going on increasing, until this year, in the face of these exigencies, the grand total of estimates is about twelve millions more than it was the last year, and about fourteen millions more than the actual appropriations of last year. And we are crowded with deficiencies at that. Some deficiencies, which a recent emergency makes necessary, I know are pressing upon us and which we have to meet, and which no patriotic heart in this House can resist. But there are other deficiencies, in my opinion, where it is our duty to apply the law which renders illegal everything that pertains to the incurring of debts without authority. Sir, I think my colleague, when he comes to review this matter, will see he had better join with me in what he may even call the picayune business of cutting down the expenditures, a little while at least, before he confesses to those who hold our bonds, abroad and at home, that we are in such condition financially that the only way in which we can meet the interest on our bonds now due and our current expenses is to increase our indebtedness.

Mr. COX rose.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say one word.

Mr. DAWES. I will yield to my colleague after I have yielded to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. I desire to ask the gentleman one question: whether or not the reduction of the tariff has been considered with a view to increasing the revenue? Has that measure come before the gentleman's committee?

Mr. DAWES. The committee has had no time to consider measures to meet these exigencies beyond those I have communicated to the House.

Mr. COX. Would it not be in order for me to suggest to the honorable gentleman, in a case so important as this, whether in the revamping of old taxes they might not during the holidays properly consider that question—the reduction of the tariff on various articles—which we all know would enhance the revenue?

A MEMBER. How can that be?

Mr. COX. I know it, for I have ciphered it out.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My learned colleague, [Mr. DAWES,] with his usual adroitness, has wholly avoided my proposition on the main question, and put his whole reply upon a phrase. I said "spend time in paring down estimates." Pare down, cut down, slash down, any way you please, expenditures, and I will go as far as I can in my judgment to aid you in "rigid economy." But holding open the question how much tea and coffee, whisky and tobacco, shall be taxed while you are paring, cutting, or slashing, whichever phrase you like best, estimates, is simply putting into the hands of the importer and the manufacturer, and against the people, all the taxes we put on, by allowing them to put up their prices, importing and producing their merchandise free of taxation, without getting any revenue for the Government. That is what I object to.

One word further upon the question of credit in Europe. I have heard many times before, as we have just heard, "Now, if you do anything to relieve the people we shall injure our credit in Europe;" and I want to say here that we have had too much credit in Europe for our bonds. We have them there to such an amount that we are sending $125,000,000 of gold yearly to pay interest on our bonds sold to buy and import luxuries, and the quicker Europe stops taking our bonds, the better I shall be satisfied. I have no hesitation or doubt upon this matter; yet I have always been told, whenever I said a word about bringing the currency of this country into a condition for the use and prosperity of the country, thus bringing down the rate of interest from which national banks make dividends of 10 and 15 per cent. annually and lay by 20 per cent. surplus—I have always been answered, "You will hurt our credit abroad." Sir, we carried on this great war of ours without any credit abroad, and during all that time we had to bear our own burdens and provide our currency in our own way. We then passed an act by which our credit was raised abroad, and thereby our bonds, which we had to that time carried ourselves, were sold in Europe, at from 30 to 60 cents on the dollar, and because of our raised credit we have had to buy them back, under our absurd idea of reducing the public debt, at 100 and 112 cents on the dollar. I do not desire to see this process of depletion of our wealth going on any longer, and I am not anxious what the bankers of Europe think about our credit. The quicker they stop loaning us money the happier we shall be. If they send what they are now sending over to us, the strong arms and willing hearts of the emigrant labor of their country, then we shall be able to work out our own salvation, not in fear and trembling.

Let me say a single word further and I have done. The gentleman says that estimates for appropriations are growing year by year. I hear every year from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations very loud and vehement words in favor of retrenchment and reform; and still the appropriations increase year by year. Why is that? Is it his fault? By no means. Our country increases every year in a greater ratio than twelve million to two hundred and seventy-seven million. We have to govern Alaska. We have new industries to develop all over our country, new offices to be created, and new machinery of government to be created or set in motion and sustained, new public buildings to be erected, or rent paid for hired ones at greater cost. And when any gentleman accuses the republican party of increasing estimates year by year—for we are responsible for this Government—I want him to put in the same sentence, so that the papers cannot quote one without quoting the other, that we are legislating for and governing a country increasing every year in a still more rapid proportion. Let the bane and the antidote go forth together.

Mr. DAWES. I now yield a few moments to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not sought, so far as I am concerned, to go into this wide debate on Treasury notes and our foreign credit. I assume that, whatever Jews and others may think, we all desire to have a Government that has a good credit; we all desire to have a Government that is careful in its expenditures, and that raises revenues enough to pay as it goes.

There is, however, a great deal of point in one suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to which I desire to call attention. It is very unfortunate, if we are not going to levy a tax on whisky, tea, and coffee, that it should have gone out to the coun'ry that the Treasury Department needs to have the revenues from those articles increased.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I did not send that out.

Mr. GARFIELD. And I have desired to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means whether his committee have thought it wise to divulge that to the country, if they have divulged it. I do not know how it got out, but it has seemed to me that it was exceedingly imprudent on the part of somebody to say to the country that we had to have $42,000,000 of revenue, and that we want so much on tea, and so much on coffee, and so much on whisky, and that now the country is to be told that we hesitate whether we will impose those taxes or not. Of course I cannot believe that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has given the country this intelligence; but it seems to me very unfortunate that it got out.

Mr. DAWES. I will say that I do not know how this matter became public. I know that upon the receipt of these communications the Committee on Ways and Means resolved upon the strictest secrecy upon the matter; and while they were meeting it was in the New York dailies, so that at night, after we had adjourned with mouths as closed as if they were sealed, we received in the New York dailies all that we had resolved we would conceal. That is all I know about it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Allow me to ask why the public should not have this information? Why should it not be known, and not confined to a single committee, to be pumped out of them by some one, and the information to be used for the personal interest of some person? I think the whole country had a right to have it, and I thank the Secretary for putting it in print. I am sorry that the Committee on Ways and Means thought it necessary to pass a resolution of secrecy.

Mr. DAWES. The reason the Committee on Ways and Means thought it best not to proclaim it was the reason suggested by my colleague, [Mr. BUTLER.] As my colleague is so much better a controversialist than I am, I turn the gentleman over to him to answer that question. One word now in reply to my colleague. He says that year after year he hears from me this announcement and this warning against the increase of expenditures.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I said from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DAWES. And from the Committee on Appropriations. My memory serves me as to a memorable occasion on which my colleague arraigned me, when I was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, for doing just exactly what I am trying to do now. It has been my lot more than once to get up in this House and undertake to warn the House of what I felt was coming on—because of no superior sagacity on my part, but because I happened to hold official positions which had devolved upon me without my choice. I have gone to work with my colleague and others in this House earnestly and sincerely to prove myself a false prophet time and again. And when that result has come, it has been because the House has sincerely gone to work, myself with them, and then my colleague and others have turned around and pointed at what I have said, and charged me with being a false prophet. Now I submit that no man will work more earnestly than I will do to prove myself to be this day a false prophet in reference to this matter. If I have done any good in any position I have ever occupied here in this House, it was with a sincere conviction of the truth of what I have said. I have felt as if sometimes I have contributed a little to arouse the attention of the House to a work which they did not feel just then of so much importance as I, being myself behind the scenes, knew it to be. And I congratulated the country more than once that the House proclaimed more clearly than I ever did its intention to retrench, and came up to the work in a better spirit and with a more thorough determination to accomplish it than ever I had the vanity to think I could do.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to ask the gentleman a single question. I wish he would state to the House whether, so far as fortifications and public buildings are concerned, and all those matters in which he proposes reduction, the committee and the House are not just as competent to settle the question now as they will be after sending back the estimates to the Departments?

Mr. DAWES. In reply, I say that I do not know. I do not know how competent the House is.

Mr. KELLOGG. We have all the items before us.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest that those whose business it is to have care of the fortifications and public buildings would be likely to know more about them than I do. I say nothing of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. NIBLACK. I hope the gentleman will allow me to say a word.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.]

Mr. NIBLACK. I do not propose to discuss the questions of currency and taxation which this Congress will have to meet. This, it strikes me, is a plain proposition. The imposition of increased taxes is, of course, a very ungracious thing for us to do in the present depressed financial condition of the country, but I presume that gentlemen here on all sides will be willing to impose whatever taxes are necessary to sustain the public credit. If, however, by calling the attention of the Departments to the estimates which have been submitted to us, and which it is understood were made in advance of the present depressed financial condition of the country, the amount of expenditures for the ensuing year can be reduced, and by that means we can be relieved of the necessity of the additional taxes recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, I feel that every member ought to be willing to make an effort to do so, and that while the adoption of this resolution will have the effect of postponing the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury for a brief time, yet it will result, I hope, in satisfying the country that Congress is willing to make an honest effort to avert the imposition of these increased taxes; and if we find it absolutely necessary that they should be imposed, I think the country will submit more cheerfully to the increased taxation than they would if we were to make haste to impose them without first making these inquiries of the Departments.

Therefore I cannot see what injury this resolution can do, and I hope that gentlemen on both sides of the House will agree to support it at this time.

Mr. COBURN. The pending resolution seems to contemplate an appeal to the Departments to suggest to us what we should do in our own right upon this floor in the matter of economy. If I understand properly the duty of members of Congress, it is not to ask Departments particularly as to what they shall do, but to see to it themselves that the Departments are economical. The Departments properly enough make their estimates, and properly enough they submit them to us, and properly enough ask for ample appropriation to meet their wants. But there is something for us to do besides looking at the estimates of the Departments, and that is an intelligent examination of those subjects on the part of Congress.

Now, sir, how can that be done? Can it be done by organizing a little petty despotism on this floor composed of eleven or thirteen members of one committee who are to have the entire charge of all the appropriations of the Government? Why, sir, in looking around over the intelligent faces of members of this House one would think that it would be possible to organize a half-dozen committees to inquire into the expenses of the Government and provide for the necessary appropriations, and not to depend so entirely and abjectly upon the Departments.

I introduced some days since, and had referred to the Committee on the Rules, a resolution that, in my judgment, will be worth a hundred of such resolutions as that of the gentlemen from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] It is a resolution providing for a new rule, authorizing the division of the Committee on Appropriations into six or seven separate committees, each one of them authorized in its particular sphere to look into the expenditure of the Government and into this matter of appropriations, and not to depend upon the dictations of Bureaus; in a word, to couple the power to investigate with the power to appropriate. Every year the method of departmental dictation is followed. We apply to the Departments, we ask the Secretaries, we ask the heads of Bureaus, what we shall do as to public expenditures, and we record their decrees. It is time that that thing was over; it is time we were reorganizing the House upon this question and ceasing to apply so much to those whose province it is to cry give, give.

Sir, are we helpless; are we impotent? Shall we sit here every year and be dictated to by the Departments? Every man who has had any experience in Congress knows as well as he knows he is alive that in one Department or another the appropriations are excessive every year. And he knows this, too: that it is not for a lack of faithfulness and integrity upon the part of the Committee on Appropriations, but from the fact that they have too much to do. Here is the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] just before me, who for several years has had charge of the reports of the Committee on Commerce in relation to rivers and harbors, and in order to get up a little appropriation bill of only five or six millions, it takes that committee a large part of their time for an entire session; and yet the Committee on Appropriations will come and roll in twenty or thirty million dollars at a time upon us, and pass it through in a day or two with very little discussion, and quote the pressing demands of the Departments as ample justification for outlays that seem enormous. More than a hundred millions pass under their hands in swift succession.

Look for a moment at past legislation; see your appropriation bills saddled with the most vital and important enactments upon all subjects, and remember that the one committee having charge in and out of conference committees has been that on appropriations, and, by this, measure its overshadowing power.

This committee has had too much to do. Take any one of the great appropriation bills which for years they have had charge of; the executive and legislative bill, the Army appropriation bill, the naval appropriation bill; each one of these bills is brought in by a single member of that committee, advocated by a single member, and, perhaps, understood only by that one member of the committee. We all know very well that the plan is to refer one of these bills to a subcommittee, consisting of but one or two members, for consideration and preparation.

Now, I find no fault with anybody for this being done. The Committee on Appropriations, with their herculean labors, can do nothing else. But we should have a force of at least fifty members on this floor ready to investigate all expenses and appropriations, and to sift to the bottom every demand of these Departments.

Here the true work of saving money will begin, right here in our midst, where it ought to, and not at the other end of the line, where, in the nature of things, it never can. Let us organize a corps of economists on this floor and all assaults upon the Treasury will be made in vain.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now call the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the preamble and resolution as now modified be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it appears that, since the estimates of appropriations required for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, which have been laid before the House, were made by the several Departments of the Government, the country has entered upon a period of great financial embarrassment, accompanied by a shrinkage of values and a heavy falling off of the revenues; and whereas the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended, in an official letter to the Committee on Ways and Means, an increase in certain customs duties and internal taxation; and whereas in the judgment of this House the foregoing facts make it the duty of Congress to reduce the expenditures to the lowest possible point consistent with the necessities of the Government: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause a revision of said estimates to be made by the several Executive Departments, and cause a report to be made to this House, if possible, as early as the 5th of January next, setting forth in detail what public expenditures for the current fiscal year, and what estimates for the next fiscal year, can be reduced, and the amount of such reduction, without serious detriment to the public service.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the preamble and resolutions were adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following privileged resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses adjourn on Tuesday, the 23d instant, they adjourn to meet again on Monday, the 5th day of January next, at twelve o'clock noon.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to amend the resolution so as to provide that the adjournment shall take place on Friday, the 19th.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. DAWES. I will simply say that the Committee on Ways and Means considered that subject, and while they did not feel willing to recommend that day, instructed me, if the amendment should be suggested, to take the judgment of the House upon the matter. I therefore yield for the amendment.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I modify my amendment so as to provide further that the day for the reassembling of the two Houses shall be Tuesday, the 6th of January.

Mr. DAWES. I am willing to take the sense of the House upon this question.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SCOFIELD, there were—ayes 152, noes 61.

Mr. ORTH called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 145, nays 114, not voting 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Ashe, Averill, Banning, Barry, Bell Biery, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bromberg, Roderick R. So the amendment of Mr. SCOFIELD was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOAN OF 1858.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill (H. R. No. 478) to provide for the redemption of the loan of 1858.

Mr. DAWES. I move to refer this bill, with the amendments of the Senate, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Elections:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be empowered to grant such time for the establishment of the testimony destroyed by fire, and for the taking of additional testimony, in the contested-election case in the first congressional district of Georgia, as shall be proper.

TEMPORARY LOAN FOR SUPPORT OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that the taxes which now burden the people should not be increased; but that the extraordinary means, if any be required, for the support of the Government, during the temporary paralysis of the industries of the country now prevailing, should be obtained by a temporary loan or loans, bearing a low rate of interest in currency, and redeemable in United States notes.

Mr. DAWES. I wish my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] would let that be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and others. O, no.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will not consent to a reference of the resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means I shall call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well; we are all anxious to record our votes upon it.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

MILEAGE.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on Mileage desires the following notice to be given to members:

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Mileage will cause each Member and Delegate to this Congress to be furnished with forms to aid them in making up their accounts of expenses incurred in attending the first session of the Forty-third Congress, and respectfully request that they be returned to the committee after the adjournment for the holidays.

H. S. BUNDY, Chairman.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 130) to remove the disabilities of Thomas S. Bocock, E. J. Harvie, and Daniel Trigg, of Virginia, and John H. Reagan, of Texas; and

An act (S. R. No. 474) to establish a post-route from the village of L'Anse, in the county of Houghton, in the State of Michigan, to Huron Bay, in said county and State.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] to adjourn, pending a motion to suspend the rules made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

The House divided; and there were ayes 131, noes not counted.

Mr. KELLEY demanded the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were ayes 36.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether that is a sufficient number.

Mr. KELLEY demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KELLEY and Mr. COX were appointed.

The question was again taken; and the tellers reported ayes 44—more than one-fifth of those present.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 119, nays 113, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Beck, Begole, Berry, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Amos Clark, jr., John B. So the motion was agreed to.

During the vote, there being no objection, the reading of the roll was dispensed with.

The SPEAKER said: The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] desires that the bill recommitted to the Special Committee on Salaries, and which they are under instructions to report, may be ordered to be printed.

There was no objection; and the bill was ordered to be printed.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

And then (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 16, 1873.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I wish to ask for a correction of the Journal. I observed in the reading of the Journal that it is stated that the motion which I made yesterday in reference to Louisiana matters was that the evidence and the reports in the Louisiana contested-election cases be brought in and laid on the table. The motion was as to the papers in all the cases relating to Louisiana. The resolution referred to a committee to inquire whether there was a legal State government in Louisiana could hardly be called a contested-election case. That was the one upon which most of the evidence was introduced and reports made. And there should also be added at the end the words "and printed."

Mr. MORTON. I did not hear the concluding remark of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. It should also be added at the end of the statement in the Journal "and printed."

Mr. MORTON. I suppose the Senator hardly means that.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. That was my intention.

Mr. MORTON. To have that large volume reprinted?

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. It will be of but little use if it is not printed.

Mr. MORTON. I suppose the Senate will hardly order the reprinting of a volume which will cost five or six thousand dollars without understanding what they are about. I do not care anything about it myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana object to the correction proposed?

Mr. MORTON. That was not in the motion yesterday. I think the Senate will hardly do that without some consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves to correct the Journal in the manner indicated by him. The question is on that motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. The question is upon reprinting that great volume. It does seem to me that we can get copies enough in the library here without reprinting it.

Mr. MORTON. I presume every Senator will find it among his bound documents now.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I have been informed that the supply is exhausted.

Mr. SHERMAN. It may be in the document room, as is very often the case; but if the Senator will send to the Library of Congress he will find enough copies.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I have a copy of my own. It is not for my own purposes that I ask the printing.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is hardly worth while to reprint it, because we can get access to thirty or forty copies of it in the library and other places.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I am perfectly willing to let the matter of printing drop for the present, until we can make further inquiries.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that I made every effort to get a copy and failed. There is no copy to be had.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have one which the Senator can have.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator had half a dozen copies. What has he done with them?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I gave them away.

Mr. CONKLING. Every Senator has a copy of this document bound up with the documents of the last session. It cannot be lost, because it is in the bound documents.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. The new Senators have not got them.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senators who came in after the 4th of March? I am inclined to think, under the rule, those Senators have it. My impression is that the rule covers them; some other Senator will know better.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There are plenty of these documents in the Senate Chamber and our different libraries and committee rooms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Connecticut withdraws his motion for the present.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. As far as printing is concerned. The other correction ought to be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the other correction indicated by the Senator? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WEST. What is that other correction, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. The entry on the Journal is:

Ordered, That the reports and evidence taken during the last session of the Forty-second Congress in the contested-election cases from the State of Louisiana be taken from the files.

This is proposed to be corrected by substituting the words, "reports and evidence taken during the last session of the Forty-second Congress in relation to affairs in the State of Louisiana."

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. That will do. I merely want to cover the whole ground.

Mr. WEST. That will do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and that correction will be made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, the 19th instant, they adjourn to meet again on Tuesday, the 6th day of January next, at twelve o'clock noon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 130) to remove the disabilities of Thomas S. Bocock, E. J. Harvie, and Daniel Trigg, of Virginia, and John H. Reagan, of Texas; and

A bill (H. R. No. 474) to establish a post-route from the village of L'Anse, in the county of Houghton, State of Michigan, to Huron Bay, in the said county and State.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying that 160 acres of land may be given to each of the soldiers of the late war, without regard to the homestead law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present the petition of the daughters and sole heirs of the late George Catlin, asking the attention of Congress to a collection of several hundred oil paintings, and to the number of 20,000 figures, illustrating the various games and hunting scenes and religious customs of the Indians, and also a museum of weapons and implements of the chase. I would say, Mr. President, that this petition sets out that Mr. Catlin had declined to sell this gallery to foreign countries, and its purchase has been recommended by Mr. Webster, Mr. Cass, and other statesmen. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of Esther M. Shubrick, widow of the late Captain Edward R. Shubrick, United States Navy, asking that her pension be restored to $50 a month; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of colored citizens of Jefferson County, West Virginia, asking for the enactment of a law that will secure to them and to their children civil rights in the courts, schools, theaters, public conveyances, hotels, and all other public places; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the memorial of Seth Driggs, a citizen of the United States and of the State of New York, touching a claim of his arising from the arrest and detention of the ship Good Return by the Colombian Confederacy; and I move that it be referred, with an accompanying printed statement, to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, presented the petition of the mayor and aldermen of the town of Austin, Texas, asking an appropriation for the improvement of Red Fish Bar, at Galveston; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of the State of Ohio, praying for the repeal of the law allowing newspapers to be carried without prepayment of postage; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yesterday morning I presented a petition from soldiers and sailors in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and moved its reference to the Committee on Public Lands. I find that prior petitions on the same subject have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask unanimous consent that that motion may be reconsidered and the petition referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present the petition of 350 citizens, bankers, merchants, and business men of the city of New York, and also petitions from the cities of Albany and Newburgh, and from the county of Ulster, in the State of New York; from the county of Sussex, in the State of New Jersey; from six or eight different counties and cities in the State of Pennsylvania, and about the same number in the State of Ohio; from three counties and cities in the State of Maine; from the city of Amherst, in the State of Massachusetts; from the county of Kent, in the State of Delaware; from the county of the same name in the State of Maryland; from some six or eight counties and cities in the State of Virginia; from the county of Marion, in the State of West Virginia; from several counties in the State of North Carolina; from counties in the State of South Carolina; from a county in the State of Florida; from some six counties in the State of Georgia; from three counties in the State of Alabama; from four counties and three cities in the State of Mississippi; from a county in the State of Louisiana; from three counties and two cities in the State of Texas; from four counties in the State of Tennessee; from four counties in the State of Kentucky; from one county in the State of Arkansas; from one city and three counties in the State of Indiana; from four counties and one city in the State of Michigan; from some seven counties and three cities in the State of Illinois; from two counties and three cities in the State of Wisconsin; from six counties and four cities in the State of Missouri; from one county and four cities in the State of Kansas; from one county in the State of Nebraska; from two cities in the State of California; from one county in the State of Oregon; from one county in the Territory of Dakota; from one county in the Territory of New Mexico; and from five counties and three cities in the State of Iowa, all asking the repeal of the bankrupt law. I move that these petitions be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY presented a petition of a large number of citizens of Peoria, Illinois, praying the passage of an act fixing a uniform rate of compensation to letter-carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WEST presented a memorial of several thousand citizens of Louisiana, in reference to the condition of affairs in that State; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented a memorial of citizens of Omaha, Nebraska, praying the establishment of a branch mint at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of Enos Lowe, late receiver of public moneys at the land-office at Council Bluffs, Iowa, asking extra compensation for services rendered in locating land-warrants; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ALLISON presented the petition of C. B. Dean, of Springfield, Iowa, praying for a pension from 1864 to 1872; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of the heirs and legal representatives of John Rice Jones, deceased, praying the confirmation of certain private land claims; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of surviving officers, soldiers, sailors, marines, and Government employés who served in the war against Mexico, now residing in the State of Oregon and Washington Territory, praying Congress to recognize their services to the same extent and in the same manner as has been enacted in favor of those who served in the war of 1812 against Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRATT. I present a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Indiana, and ask that it be read at length, printed, and laid on the table.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution instructing our Senators and requesting our Representatives in Congress to restore certain soldiers therein mentioned to their original position on the rolls of the Army.

Whereas after the surrender of the rebel Generals Lee and Johnston, with their armies, in the spring of 1865, a large number of soldiers who had enlisted in the Army of the United States "to serve three years or during the war," believing the war was at an end and their term of service expired, left their regiments and returned to their homes before they were legally and finally discharged; and whereas such soldiers were charged upon the rolls of their respective companies with desertion, in consequence of which charge they have never been able to recover from the Government of the United States any bounty or the pay that was due at the time they so left their commands: Therefore,

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their influence to secure the passage of a law by the Congress of the United States to restore all such soldiers as are mentioned in the preamble of this joint resolution to all their rights, the same as if they had been legally discharged, and to authorize the Adjutant-General of the United States Army to remove from the rolls the charge of desertion against such soldiers.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. BOGY presented the petition of the International Steamship Company, renewing proposals to construct iron-ship building yards, the production of iron for ship-building, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, it was Ordered, That the president of the William and Mary College in Virginia have leave to withdraw the petition and papers of said institution from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. BROWNLOW, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Oliver Powers, praying to be allowed pay as a private in Company K, Tenth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, up to the day that the company was discharged, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Prince Coit, a citizen of Georgetown, South Carolina, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Jearum Atkins, praying to be allowed a reasonable sum for his patent, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Anna W. Osborne, praying the passage of an act to grant her a pension, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, it was Ordered, That John R. Bond have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 160) to authorize the payment of duties on imports to be made partly in legal-tender notes and national-bank notes, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 36) to amend the act entitled "An act to reduce internal taxation, and to amend 'An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes,'" approved July 13, 1866, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 180) to repeal section 6 of the act of March 3, 1865, and section 2 of the act of March 26, 1867, imposing a tax of 10 per cent. upon circulation of bank notes, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will merely state that both these bills propose a repeal of the 10 per cent. tax on State banks, and it is a mooted question between the House and Senate whether the Senate has jurisdiction over the subject or not, and at all events the Committee on Finance are opposed to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

There was no objection, and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of W. A. Saylor, of Austin, Texas, praying Congress to refund certain taxes on cotton twice assessed and collected in 1867 and 1868, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

IMPORTED GOODS IN WAREHOUSE.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 24) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to reduce duties on imports, and to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes,'" approved March 3, 1873, to report it back without amendment; and as it is merely the correction of a clerical error in a bill passed at the last session, which referred to section 2 when it should have referred to section 8 of a certain act, I ask that it be considered now if there be no objection.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to reduce duties on imports, and to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes,'" approved March 3, 1873, so as to read as follows:

SEC. 3. That foreign merchandise which arrived at a port of the United States on or before the 31st day of July, 1872, and upon which duties were not paid prior to August 1, 1872, though the same were not entered or transferred to a public store or bonded warehouse, shall be entitled to the benefits provided for in the eighth section of the act entitled "An act to reduce duties on imports, and to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1872, the same as such merchandise would have been entitled to had it actually been in public store or bonded warehouse on or prior to the 31st day of July, 1872.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. This bill barely changes a single word in the act alluded to, so as to refer to the proper section instead of the wrong one.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPITOL AND DEPARTMENTAL TELEGRAPH.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 89) in relation to the lines of telegraph connecting the Capitol with the various Departments of the Government, to report it back without amendment, and as it is rather important that it should be acted upon by the House before the recess, after the bill is read, if there be no objection, I will ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place the lines of telegraph constructed under and by virtue of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," under the supervision of the officer in charge of the public buildings and grounds; and he is authorized and empowered to make rules and regulations for the working of the lines.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will merely say that these lines have been constructed, but there is no one who is authorized to take charge of them, and this bill simply provides that the officer in charge of the public buildings and grounds shall have charge of these lines.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTRAORDINARY EXPENSES OF THE NAVY.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 481) making appropriations for extraordinary expenses of the naval service, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage, and to ask for the consideration of the bill at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MORTON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine whether it is of pressing importance to take up the bill this morning? If not, I trust it will be passed by until to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In reply to the Senator I shall be obliged to say that I do not know that it is absolutely important that it should pass to-day. Of course a single objection would carry it over if I were to attempt to press it; but I feel bound to say this: that it is of the utmost importance that it should pass early, and I hope to-morrow. It provides for a deficiency in the Navy caused by the exigencies of the public service, which are known to the whole country as well as to Congress, and therefore it should be passed at an early day.

Mr. MORTON. I am satisfied it will give rise to debate. I understand the character of the bill, and I shall therefore object to its consideration now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator feels authorized, I suppose, to object to its consideration, and therefore it will go over necessarily until to-morrow. But I take this opportunity to say that I shall feel it my duty to-morrow to invite the attention and consideration of the Senate to this bill, and hope there will then be no objection to it.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HOWE presented the annual report of the Librarian of Congress, exhibiting the progress of the library during the year ending December 1, 1873; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOWE submitted the following order; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Ordered, That five hundred additional copies of the annual report of the Librarian of Congress, for the year ending December 1, 1873, be printed, with paper covers, for the use of the Librarian.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 191) to amend the act entitled "An act relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 192) for the relief of Siloma Deck; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. STEVENSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 193) for the benefit of Uriah Porter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 195) for the relief of Patrick Eagin, in his own right, and as administrator of the estate of William Donnelly, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 196) canceling the sale of the Brazos Santiago military railroad; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the papers already on the files on the same subject, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOGY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 197) to establish an iron-ship building-yard on the waters falling into the Atlantic and an iron-ship building-yard on the Mississippi or one of its tributaries, and to afford facilities to the Navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 198) for the relief of Fanny A. Thompson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 199) relating to the circuit courts of the United States for the district of Alabama; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 200) for the relief of Enos Lowe, late receiver of public moneys at the land office at Council Bluffs, Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CROZIER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 201) to create an additional land district in the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 202) to remove the legal and political disabilities of William Steele, of Bexar County, Texas; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. By request, and without by any means committing myself to its provisions, I ask leave, without previous notice, to introduce the bill which I hold in my hand.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 203) to facilitate assorting and redeeming national-bank note currency, and to authorize the issue of circulating notes to the amount of 92 per cent. in lieu of the 90 per cent. now authorized by law; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

MONUMENT TO CHEVALIER DE TERNAY.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 194) in relation to the monument erected to the memory of the Chevalier de Ternay; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask that the bill may be read at length, and I desire the Senate to indulge me for five minutes while I explain the reason for its passage.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $800, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money not otherwise appropriated to defray the expense of repairing and protecting from decay the monument erected at Newport, Rhode Island, to the memory of the Chevalier de Ternay, the commander of the French naval forces in aid of the American Revolution in the year 1780, the money hereby appropriated to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. ANTHONY. The 11th of July, 1780, was a memorable day in the history of the country. On that day, the Chevalier Charles Louis d'Arsac de Ternay, an admiral in the French navy, Knight of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, arrived off the coast of Rhode Island, and entered the harbor of Newport, with seven ships of the line, two frigates and several smaller armed vessels; and with a convoy of thirty-six transports, carrying between six and seven thousand troops, under the command of Count de Rochambeau.

This armament arrived at one of the dark periods of the unequal struggle which the American Colonies were waging with the might of England; when baffled valor and disheartened patriotism looked, with faltering faith, to Heaven, for the succor which seemed to be denied to all human effort. A little while before, Washington had written to Joseph Reed, "I have almost ceased to hope."

The arrival of De Ternay and Rochambeau inspirited the country and filled its councils with new hope. They were received with every demonstration of official respect and of popular gratulation. The General Assembly presented an address to the two commanders; the city of Newport, which had long been renowned as the chief seat of culture and social refinement in America, welcomed them with a cordial and elegant hospitality, most grateful after their wearisome voyage of more than two months, and which called forth enthusiastic praises in the correspondence of the Duc de Lauzun and others of the French officers. The town was illuminated from pavement to steeple-top; fire-works blazed along the streets, and bonfires lighted up the unequaled harbor, in which the friendly vessels were anchored, and on whose broad bosom the navies of the world might ride with ample space and safety.

I need not refer to the plans of extensive operations that were formed by the French commanders in consultation with Washington and the chiefs of the Continental Army; nor to the cause which postponed the execution of these plans, and so long delayed the realization of the hopes founded on the alliance with France. All this is matter of history.

The Chevalier de Ternay remained in command of the French naval force in America till his death, which occurred on the 15th of the following December, very suddenly, at the house of Dr. William Hunter, the father of William Hunter, who was twice elected a member of this body, and afterward was appointed minister to Brazil; and grandfather to William Hunter, so long and honorably connected with the Department of State.

The Chevalier de Ternay was buried at Newport. With the liberality in religious matters which, from the beginning, has distinguished the people of Rhode Island, a portion of a Protestant cemetery was set apart for his burial, and consecrated according to the rites of the Roman Catholic Church; and in this spot, hallowed by two of the great branches of the Christian faith, the warrior who had fought for two countries, and in many climes, was laid to his long repose. It was in the ground surrounding the venerable and beautiful edifice where Honeyman ministered, and where Berkeley worshipped and preached—Trinity church. The body of the dead admiral was borne on the shoulders of the men whom he had commanded. Nine priests chanted the funeral service. The imposing ceremonial of the Roman Catholic Church, the pomp of military and naval pageantry, the sorrowing population that thronged around the grave of their friend and ally, fallen in the strength of his manhood and in the fullness of his fame, made the event long remembered as the largest and most distinguished obsequies that had ever been celebrated in that city.

After the peace, the King of France placed a memorial over the grave of the man who had borne his commission on many seas and had served him with so great fidelity. On a slab of Egyptian marble, in letters of gold, an epitaph recounts his services and commemorates his virtues. The epitaph is in Latin. A translation is furnished by an accomplished scholar, Sidney Everett, in a very interesting paper read before the Historical Society at Newport, and since published in the New England Historical and Genealogical Register. It is as follows:

Charles Louis d'Arsac de Ternay, a knight of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, though not yet having taken the vows, of old and noble family of Armorican descent, one of the admirals of the royal fleets, a citizen, a soldier and a commander, deserving well of his king and country for 42 years, lies under this marble. Fortunate and bold, after the disaster of St. Croix in the years 1760 and 1761, in spite of the enemy's attacks and with severe labor, he floated off and got away the royal ships, from the dark whirlpools, and after they had been separated by the tortuous windings of the river Vilaine restored them safe to their stations. In the year 1762 he invaded Newfoundland in America. In 1772 giving up his command, he devoted himself wholly to governing the Islands of France and Bourbon during seven years, to the advantage of France, and the happiness of the colonists. In the year 1780, being sent by his most Christian King with relief to the Federal States struggling for liberty, he occupied Rhode Island. While he was preparing himself for new dangers he died in this city, to the grief of his fellow officers, and with the laments and regrets of the Federal States, eminent for every virtue and mourned by his friends, on the 15th December, 1780, aged 58. His Most Christian Majesty, the judge of virtue, in order that the memory of a distinguished man should be consecrated to posterity, ordered this monument to be placed here in 1783.*

The masonry which supported this marble had crumbled, and the whole structure was falling to decay, when it attracted the notice of the Marquis de Noailles, the French minister at Washington, who immediately directed it to be repaired and a granite slab, suitably inscribed, to be placed over it, and removed the marble, with the original inscription, renovated and restored, to the interior of the church, where it is to be placed in a perpendicular position, supported by an escutcheon in marble of the Knights Hospitallers of Saint John of Jerusalem.

It seems manifestly improper that the country should permit this pious duty to be performed—I will not say by a stranger, for the kinsman of La Fayette cannot be a stranger in America—but by any individual or by any other government. De Ternay did not, indeed, like La Fayette, inspired by the love of liberty, volunteer his maiden sword in aid of our struggling nationality; but with willing obedience to the commands of his sovereign he brought to our assistance skill, experience, and a name renowned in war. His premature death prevented the benefit which the country expected from his services, yet those services, so long as life lasted, were appreciated by both governments. His own government honored his sepulcher, and left it in the charge of ours, on the soil which he had defended, and among the people whom he had succored. We cannot delegate that trust, or permit any but the highest authority to administer it.

We must not, in the honors which we pay to the heroes of our own time, forget those whose deeds illustrate our earlier annals, lest the fame which we now celebrate may, in its turn, be put aside by that which is not brighter in luster, but nearer to the living generation. But let us hold in equal remembrance those who have identified their names with the glory of the country, in whatever time they flourished, from whatever clime they came. And let the coming generations be taught that those who contribute to the defense, the advancement, the renown of the Great Republic shall never be forgotten, but shall live in grateful remembrance, coeval with its own immortal life.

It may be proper, although it is not necessary, to say that I propose this resolution wholly without the knowledge of the Marquis de Noailles. I move its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY subsequently said: It has been suggested to me, and I think myself it would be more gracious, if the bill which I introduced appropriating $800 for the repair and preservation of the monument of the Chevalier de Ternay should be passed without a reference. I am quite sure no one will object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill introduced by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution I offered yesterday in regard to the admission of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to the proposition of the Senator from Indiana, subject to morning business. I have a resolution to offer.

Mr. MORTON. If the matter is taken up, I will then give way to morning business.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, I wish to say a word before this resolution of the Senator from Indiana is taken up. I had intended, when the Louisiana question came before the Senate, to address the Senate upon it. I did not anticipate that it would come before us in the present shape, or so speedily. I had not supposed, indeed, that it would be called up before the holidays. It now comes before us, not in the shape of the report of a committee, not accompanied by any facts of any kind, but as a resolution offered upon the responsibility of a single Senator, declaring that Mr. Pinchback is, prima facie, entitled to a seat. The Senator who introduces the resolution states that, in his view of it, its correctness is established by the mere principles of law involved upon the face of the credentials of Mr. Pinchback, and therefore no inquiry and no report as to any facts surrounding those credentials are needed for the information of the Senate, in his view. On the other hand, in my view of the case, there is needed a report of the facts surrounding those credentials—facts which have been investigated once at great length by a committee of the Senate, and which have a very material bearing upon the case; and in the views which I mean to present to the Senate, should opportunity be afforded, I shall have to take into consideration, to a considerable extent, the facts to which I have alluded.

I now rise to say that, from the circumstance that I interpose no objection to the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Indiana, I do not wish to be understood as consenting to the final disposition of that resolution at any particular time, and to add further the hope that, this week, at any rate, it will not be pressed to a vote. I cannot work quite as fast as I could once, and I would like, before the debate is closed, to submit some suggestions to the Senate.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. President, I wish to inquire in what position the pending resolution reported from the Committee on Finance will be if this motion prevails.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution introduced by him yesterday, in regard to the seat of Mr. Pinchback.

Mr. FENTON. Allow me to ask if it displaces the resolution reported from the Committee on Finance, or will that come up at any time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This, if taken up, will undoubtedly displace that until this is disposed of.

Mr. SHERMAN. Until one o'clock only.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This resolution coming up in the morning hour, the resolution to which the Senator from New York refers will be the order of business at one o'clock. The Chair was mistaken in supposing this could supersede that at one o'clock.

Mr. FENTON. While I am up, then, I will give notice that if this or other business shall occupy to-day, I will endeavor to get the floor to address the Senate upon the resolution reported by the Finance Committee to-morrow. Indeed, I am not ready to make my remarks to-day, and I give notice that I will seek an opportunity to do so to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I hope the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana in reference to the admission of Mr. Pinchback will not be taken up this morning. A resolution has come to the Senate from the other House, proposing an adjournment on Friday next till after New Year's day; and this is certainly a question of too much importance to be disposed of before Friday. If we get into a discussion of this question, it precludes the consideration of all other questions whatever. A question of this importance and magnitude cannot go through without general debate. That general debate necessarily stops any consideration of any other questions. I think, therefore, that we ought not to take up a subject of this kind, especially when it comes here not from any committee, but is simply a resolution offered on the individual responsibility of the Senator from Indiana himself; but we should let this matter go over until after the holidays, when we shall be more fully in possession of all the facts in connection with the case, and then let us discuss it in the light in which it deserves, calmly and deliberately, and arrive at a just conclusion in reference to what ought to be done. I hope, therefore, that the resolution will not be taken up for consideration this morning.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, in order that I may give the reasons which induce me to desire that this resolution may not come up now, I should like to have the resolution read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the credentials of P. B. S. Pinchback for a seat in the Senate of the United States for six years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1873, being in regular form, he is entitled under the law and in conformity with the usages of the Senate to be sworn in as a member, and that whatever ground of contest there may be as to his right to a seat should be made thereafter.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, this resolution I understand is a resolution of the Senator from Indiana, and not reported by any committee. It appears that the Committee on Privileges and Elections at the last session of Congress, and at this session of Congress, have made examination at great length in reference to this question. The result of their labors has been to come in and say to the Senate that this matter is so much involved that, after a long and laborious investigation for two sessions—after having made a report now on file, covering, some one said, nearly a thousand pages, they are unable to agree, and refer the matter back to the Senate; upon which an individual member of the committee offers a resolution declaring that one of these parties is entitled to the seat, prima facie, no matter what may be the result of a future investigation.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that the mover of that resolution has mixed up past, present, and future like a long-forgotten dream. It seems to me that, after investigation for two sessions, to offer a resolution that a man is entitled to a seat in this body without looking at the evidence which has been for two sessions taken to see whether he was or was not entitled to a seat, and upon which the committee are unable to report, is simply an absurd proposition. It is one, I say, which mixes the past and the future together. It reminds me of the expression, "I walk by your side while you follow before;" or, as an Italian gentleman once told me, "I am departed to-morrow for Europe." [Laughter.] Here, we are told, is a prima facie case, and the claimant is entitled, without examination, to be admitted on his credentials.

Mr. President, representing the sovereignty of the States, when a Senator came into this body in old times and put down his credentials, with the broad seal of his State upon the paper, he was entitled to his seat on his credentials, prima facie. That is a prima facie case. He was always admitted—admitted under every circumstance except when there were such allegations as denied the authenticity of the seal which gave him a right to take his seat in this body; and that was right. The rule was universal. Nothing could prevent a man taking his seat but the denial of the authenticity of his credentials; and if it turned out that the Legislature which elected him was not the Legislature of the State; if it turned out that any circumstance behind those credentials ought to be examined into under the power which the Senate possesses to decide who are chosen members of this body, that was a question which could subsequently be examined. But, Mr. President, by an act of Congress under which this election purports to have taken place, what those credentials shall be has been defined; and upon the presentation of those credentials, if they are in accordance with law, under the old doctrine any gentleman is entitled to be admitted prima facie.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to inquire whether it is in order now to discuss the merits of the resolution. I am willing to hear the Senator, and shall be glad to do so when the resolution is taken up; but I think he has hardly a right to make a preliminary argument against it before it is taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A discussion of the merits of the resolution is not in order on the motion to take it up.

Mr. STOCKTON. I submit to the Senate that I am not discussing the merits at all, but I am discussing the reasons why we should not take up a resolution that this gentleman is entitled to his seat before an examination is made—why we should not bring it before this body at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the remarks indicated by the Senator are in order. The merits of the resolution cannot be discussed on this motion, but a discussion of the merits of the motion to take up, of course, is in order.

Mr. STOCKTON. Very well, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend his remarks. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORTON. I understood yesterday that that resolution was passed by for the time being, laid on the table by consent, and another subject taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not so understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think Senators must perceive that it is the desire of the Senator from Indiana to make some remarks upon the resolution that he proposes to take up, and according to the established courtesies of the Senate it is always usual to allow a Senator having charge of a subject to do that. I do not understand him to propose to press a vote upon it, especially against the wishes of Senators who desire to have time to read the documents on the subject. Although I am anxious to go on with the debate on the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance, I think it is but courteous and proper that the Senator from Indiana should have the right and the opportunity now to speak to his resolution, and that any one who desires should have the right to reply to him, and then we shall have the subject before us as to this Louisiana question.

Mr. MORTON. I move to lay aside the pending order of business for the purpose of taking up the resolution that I offered.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to indicate the wish of the Senator from Indiana to make a speech on this proposition, that it is to be taken up for that purpose, and then we are to resume the consideration of the financial question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I presume he wishes to speak upon his resolution.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Of course I agree to that. No Senator will object to that arrangement at all. After he has got through with his speech, it is understood that this matter will go over and that we shall proceed with the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORTON. The whole matter will be under the control of the Senate, of course.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I do not think we are prepared at this time to discuss the important question of the Louisiana matter. I presume the Senate will pass the joint resolution laid upon the table this morning from the House of Representatives, providing for a recess, and then we can come back here after the holidays and take this matter into consideration, as we should, and fairly discuss the whole subject. We have not the material now before us to do so. We require information. I know I do myself require further information in regard to this matter. I made every effort to obtain a copy of the report made at the last session by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but was unable to do so. While gentlemen may say that that report does not pertain to the question, and that it is not material, yet it is part of the history of the subject, and we are required to take notice of it, and therefore we should have it. The new members of the body especially, on a matter involving so great consequences as this to the people of the country, and especially the people of Louisiana, should have an opportunity of considering it and discussing it; and how can we do it at this time? Everybody is in favor of a holiday recess, and nothing can be done before the holidays. I shall listen with great pleasure to a speech from the honorable Senator from Indiana opening the question, and then everybody can reflect upon it and come back here after the holidays prepared to do justice on the whole subject.

Mr. ALCORN. I wish to say, in behalf of the committee, that when this question came before them it was one with which the committee were well acquainted. Twelve months ago this same question was before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and a long, tedious, patient, laborious investigation was had by that committee in inquiring into all the facts involved in the present controversy. The result of that investigation was published in a volume embracing more than a thousand pages. The witnesses lived nearly two thousand miles away. Twelve months ago they were brought before the committee and examined fully and thoroughly, and cross-examined. The testimony was published to the country. It is a part of the history of the country; it has become a part of the records of the Senate; it is before the Senate.

This testimony and these records were before the committee at the time we were called upon to investigate this case the other day. The committee did not go into the detail of investigation when called to the investigation at this session of Congress; and why? Because all that detail of investigation had been made more than twelve months ago, and it was not necessary to go into it again. It was not proper to put the Government to the expense, and we did not see proper to ask the Senate to allow us to send for persons and papers for the purpose of going over the same track that had been so well beaten twelve months ago. Therefore, with that knowledge before the committee, with this record before the committee, with this testimony before the committee, we brought the fact to the Senate with the testimony and said to the Senate, "The committee is unable to agree; four and four, the committee are divided in their room, and they bring the case to the Senate and state to the Senate the facts as they exist."

Now, sir, I contend that the testimony is here; it is part of the records of the country; it is part of the history of the country. Why, sir, the fact is that there were no credentials that were brought to my notice the other day at all, except so far as the credentials were embraced in the report that was made by the committee twelve months ago. That this very question was investigated twelve months ago—not, to be sure, between the parties now here—but that it was substantially investigated one year ago, is shown by the fact that Mr. Pinchback's term commenced on the 4th of March, 1873, and he was not admitted to his seat by the Senate. Why was he not admitted to his seat in the Senate on the 4th of March, 1873? Because of the investigation that had been made by this committee; because of the facts that had been spread before the Senate; because of the fact that that committee had reported to the Senate that there was no legal government in the State of Louisiana. That report was made to the Senate. It is before the Senate to-day, and that report is made as to a certain state of facts embraced in the volume containing over a thousand pages and now constructively before the Senate.

Upon what subject did this committee divide the other day if it was not upon these facts? Upon what could they have adjudged the case but upon the facts that they had before them?

Mr. President, I only rose to make the point that all the testimony that was taken by the Committee on Privileges and Elections twelve months ago was before that committee the other day, and that upon those facts, and those facts alone, it was that the committee reported back to the Senate that they were unable to agree. It was said the other day that there were some other facts, but members of the committee stated that they were acquainted with the other facts that were proposed to be introduced, and they were free to say that the disclosure of those facts before the committee would make no difference with regard to their judgment in the case, and hence the additional facts that are stated to be now present or ready to be reported it was not necessary to report upon at all.

Mr. STOCKTON. I have no objection to the Senator from Indiana going on. It will give me great pleasure to listen to him. I wish, however, not to be misunderstood in this matter. Yesterday the Senator introduced this resolution and gave notice that he would call it up this morning, and this morning he called it up. Believing that it ought not to be taken up, I rose simply for the purpose of objecting to its being taken up. While engaged in those remarks, a point of order was made, and the Chair decided that I was in order. Then I was cut off by the expiration of the morning hour. Now the suggestion is made, which I did not know of before—perhaps I ought to have known it—that the Senator who introduced this resolution desired to make some remarks upon it. On that ground I shall make no objection whatever, and it will give me the greatest pleasure to listen to his remarks.

Mr. FENTON. I desire to inquire of the honorable Senator from Indiana if it will not suit his purpose as well to move to lay aside informally the pending resolution. I think there will be no objection to that from any quarter.

Mr. MORTON. I see no propriety in changing the motion. I asked to have the resolution taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which has been indicated.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the credentials of P. B. S. Pinchback for a seat in the Senate of the United States for six years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1873, being in regular form, he is entitled under the law, and in conformity with the usages of the Senate, to be sworn in as a member; and that whatever ground of contest there may be as to his right to a seat should be made thereafter.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, there have been some preliminary remarks made here this morning which, if they have any effect at all, must look to the merits of this resolution; and there have been some statements made in regard to the history of this question from which I dissent. For example, my friend from New Jersey [Mr. STOCKTON] stated that this question had been under discussion for some two sessions, and my friend from Mississippi [Mr. ALCORN] in substance affirmed that statement. I submit that they are both mistaken; that this question has never been before the committee, nor has it ever been before the Senate; and so far as that volume of testimony is concerned, while I have no sort of objection to anybody referring to it for any purpose, it is no part of the res gestæ; it is not a part of this case; it was taken before a different committee. The committee has been twice reorganized since that time. It was taken at a former session of Congress, in a proceeding to which Mr. Pinchback was not a party, and for which he is nowise responsible; and while it is here for reference, as every document in the document-room is, and every book in the Library is, it is no part of this case.

Mr. President, it is important that this question shall be speedily decided by the Senate. I do not mean that it shall be rushed through without consideration; but there are rights involved—the right, perhaps, of the claimant; the right of the State of Louisiana to be represented upon this floor, now deferred from the 4th of March last; and this is in every sense a privileged question. While I shall not desire to press it to the inconvenience of any Senator, I must insist that it is a question that is not to be put off with indifference from time to time.

The first proposition that I present on the resolution that I have offered is that Mr. Pinchback is entitled, upon his credentials, to be sworn in and take his seat as a member of this body; that he presents what is called a prima facie case, and upon that case he is entitled to be sworn in, and if there are grounds of contest, either because he was not elected by the right Legislature, or was elected by fraud or bribery, or that there was not a quorum of the two houses present, or that he was not elected in conformity to the act of Congress of 1866, those grounds of contest can only be urged after he has been sworn in and taken his seat, and cannot be brought forward now as a reason why he should be kept out of his seat until after those questions have been decided. I state that as my first proposition, and one that has been settled, I believe, by the uniform action of this body ever since its first organization.

Mr. President, we had this question before us not very long ago, on the presentation of the credentials of Mr. GOLDTHWAITE, a Senator from Alabama. Objections were made to his being sworn in upon the ground, in the first place, that one branch of the Legislature contained a number of persons who were ineligible to seats in that body under the fourteenth amendment. Another ground was, that a number of those members, more than constituted his majority, had not been elected; that one had been admitted to his seat without having any certificate of election, and that others were chosen by fraud and violence. That question came before the committee of which I am chairman; and a resolution was reported that Mr. GOLDTHWAITE was entitled upon a prima facie case to take his seat, and if there were grounds of contest they should be heard afterward. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That GEORGE GOLDTHWAITE be permitted to take a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Alabama upon taking the proper oath; and that the Committee on Privileges and Elections proceed hereafter to consider the grounds on which his right to a seat is contested, and hereafter make report to the Senate thereon.

Mr. THURMAN said, in the course of his remarks:

So far as GOLDTHWAITE was concerned that report was unanimous on the part of the committee, as appears by the report itself, a copy of which I hold in my hand. It went upon the ground, which has been observed ever since this Government was formed, that the certificate of election of a Senator was prima facie evidence of his right to a seat and sufficient until it was overthrown; that he was entitled on that prima facie case to his seat in the body, and if any one said he was not entitled to it the contestant was bound to overthrow that prima facie case by sufficient charges and sufficient testimony, but that in the mean time the Senator was entitled to his seat on his prima facie case.

There was not, and there is not, as I had occasion to observe then, after a most careful examination of all the precedents, a single case in the whole history of this Government in which that rule has been departed from.

Mr. THURMAN said more to this effect, but it is not necessary to read it.

As the chairman of the committee, in support of that resolution, I made the following remarks:

The committee reported the case as a prima facie case, for the action of the Senate, for him to take his seat until the question was decided. I know of nothing having been presented to the Senate since, and I believe nothing has been presented to the committee. My own views were these: that so far as the question of election of members of the Legislature by fraud was concerned, that was a matter to be determined by the Legislature itself, and that we could not go behind its decision upon the question. As to whether a member had been allowed to take his seat without having had a certificate of election and without having received a majority of the votes cast, that was also a question to be determined by the Legislature, and we could not go behind its decision.

That resolution was adopted, and Mr. GOLDTHWAITE was seated. This was regarded then as the law of the Senate. I accepted it as such toward a gentleman who differed from me in politics, for this is not a question of politics, but it is a question of law; and if it was good law for the admission of Mr. GOLDTHWAITE, a democratic Senator from Alabama, it ought to be good law for the admission of any other man who comes within the purview of it.

This question was very fully considered in the case of Potter vs. Robbins, in this body, in 1834, a case of contested election, and in some respects analogous to this. In that case the Legislature of Rhode Island, in 1832, had passed a law by which they extended the term of the governor and lieutenant-governor twelve months, by which they extended the terms of the members of the Senate twelve months, prolonging them that length of time. It was, as all must admit, an extraordinary law, an extraordinary proceeding, upon the part of the Legislature, and gave rise to much discussion at the time. After these twelve months began to run the Legislature, thus continued in existence by means of this law, elected Mr. Robbins to a seat in this body; but before he took his seat there was an election in Rhode Island of State officers and of a new Legislature, and when that new Legislature convened, unquestionably legal, it declared the former election a nullity, and proceeded to elect Mr. Potter, and both credentials were here at the same time. Upon the motion of Mr. Poindexter, it was declared by the Senate that Mr. Robbins had a prima facie case. Mr. Potter claimed that Mr. Robbins was not elected by the Legislature of Rhode Island, but that that Legislature was dead; and yet it was held by the Senate that Mr. Robbins had a prima facie case upon the certificate of the governor, and was entitled to take his seat, and that the contest should be made after that time. Mr. Robbins was sworn in, and the contest was subsequently made, upon which a report was made, to which I shall have occasion to refer hereafter, and some of the most important law with regard to the organization of this body laid down that has ever been presented by the report of a committee. Mr. Robbins was sustained in his seat upon the conclusion of the contest.

The first question, therefore, that I submit to the Senate upon this prima facie case is: Was Governor Kellogg the governor of the State of Louisiana at the time these credentials were signed? If he was, that is the end of this argument; we need proceed no further. If we hold that he was the governor of Louisiana at that time in contemplation of law as well as fact, then we need proceed no further in the argument so far as this resolution is concerned, because he certifies that Mr. Pinchback was elected a member of this body, in conformity to law, by the Legislature of Louisiana; and if it be the purpose to call in question the real character of the Legislature by which Mr. Pinchback was elected, that cannot be done under the usage of the Senate until after Mr. Pinchback takes his seat.

Then, the first question I address to the Senate is: Was Mr. Kellogg at that time the governor of Louisiana? I submit that he was; I submit that he is now, and that his title has been overwhelmingly recognized in a way and manner that this Senate is not at liberty to question. I use that phrase purposely. There is no power to compel the Senate to recognize any title; there is no power to compel the Senate to pass an appropriation bill, or to do any other act necessary for the continuation of this Government; but the Senate is not a law unto itself. It is bound by the proprieties, it is in conscience bound by the usages of the Senate and by the laws of the land.

I said Mr. Kellogg had been conclusively recognized, and in a manner that did not permit us to go behind that recognition, and to make any inquiry in regard to the conditions of the election in 1872, or the counting of the votes, or any other objection that has been made. First, he has been in complete possession of the office now for nearly twelve months from the first Monday in January of this year; he has been acting as the governor of the State in every respect for nearly twelve months, and, I may say, in undisputed possession of the office; he has been recognized by every department of the State government of Louisiana; he has been recognized by the other State officers; he has been recognized by the Legislature in various ways. That Legislature has received him as the governor, submitted its enactments to him for approval, and twice that Legislature canvassed his election and declared him to be elected; he has been recognized by the courts of Louisiana, not only the highest but the lowest courts, the courts of subordinate or inferior jurisdiction as well as the supreme court of that State—recognized continuously, and by the supreme court in repeated decisions, which, in regard to that matter, are binding upon us in law as they would be binding upon the Supreme Court of the United States, as I shall endeavor to show hereafter.

He has been further recognized as the governor by the House of Representatives. I have a right to refer to the action of the House in regard to this matter. It does not come under the rule that we may not refer to the action of the other House in a matter pending in this, because the House of Representatives has nothing to do with the question of seating Mr. Pinchback. Only the other day a member of Congress elected at the late election, a special election to fill a vacancy, who was commissioned by Mr. Kellogg as having been duly elected, presented his credentials to the House. The same opposition was made there to his admission that is made here to the admission of Mr. Pinchback, and the House decided by a vote of nearly two to one that he had a prima facie case, and was entitled to take his seat, thereby recognizing Mr. Kellogg as the governor of Louisiana.

He has been recognized as such in the transaction of all ordinary business and duties of the executive. He has collected taxes; he has enforced the laws; he has performed the ordinary routine of duties that belong to the executive, and he has also exercised on several occasions extraordinary powers without having them called in question on the ground that he was not the governor of Louisiana. And right here I want to refer to one thing in the administration of the State of Louisiana—and I will say further that I believe Louisiana has been better governed in the last ten months than at any period since the conclusion of the war—that there is now more peace, order, and security in the State of Louisiana than at any time within the last seven or eight years; nor do I believe there is any considerable number of people in the State of Louisiana who desire the impeachment of the title of Mr. Kellogg now. I believe the solid men there of all parties desire peace, stability, and a settled government, and that the attempt now to unsettle the status of that government by declaring that Mr. Pinchback was not elected by the Legislature of Louisiana, that he was not commissioned by the governor of Louisiana, does not meet with the approbation of any considerable number of the solid business men and respectable people of the State of Louisiana. I am so advised. They have had trouble enough. They want a government. They care more about government now, peace and protection, than they do about the triumph of a political party.

I have here an abstract in regard to a single matter, to show the efficiency of this administration. We have heard much about the financial condition of Louisiana, of her State debt, and the failure to collect taxes, and all that. I have a memorandum here which I will ask the Secretary to read. It is made from a statement published by Governor Kellogg over his own signature, and the correctness of it will not be called in question.

The Secretary read as follows:

LOUISIANA TAX COLLECTIONS.

Taxes collected in entire year 1872	$3,222,565 79
Taxes collected in seven months, January 1 to August 31, 1873	2,701,921 38
During the same seven months of 1872 the collections were	1,858,964 69
Or only about two-thirds of the amount collected by Governor Kellogg.
In July, 1872, the collections were	542,183 80
In July, 1873, the collections were	1,459,651 36
Interest paid by Kellogg government:
Amount due by former administration	271,839 00
Amount of current interest, January 1 to September 30, 1873	760,868 00
Total interest paid to September 30, 1873	1,032,707 00
Accruing interest in October, November, and December, 1873, yet to be provided for	284,970 00

Mr. MORTON. That statement, Mr. President, will bear me out, I think, in the assertion that there has been a better collection of taxes during this year than any previous year in the history of Louisiana since the war; that there is now more efficient administration, and that the credit of the State of Louisiana, instead of being depressed under what is here styled a usurpation, is now being strengthened and elevated.

I was remarking that there was no considerable number of people in Louisiana now, I believe, who desire to have this government destroyed. I do not say there is not a large party there opposed in politics to Mr. Kellogg, and who would not vote against him; but they do not desire that his government shall be disturbed until they are again called to the polls. They are not anxious that there shall be a civil war inaugurated by a declaration on the part of this Senate, or either branch of Congress, that the Kellogg government is a usurpation.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to refer to the recognition of Mr. Kellogg as governor of that State by the President of the United States, and I will show in the first place what is the effect of a recognition of a State government by the Executive of this nation. I shall have occasion in this matter to refer to the celebrated case of Luther vs. Borden, a case arising in Rhode Island, out of what was called the Dorr rebellion, and the Senate will have no trouble in perceiving that the extract I shall read from the opinion of the Supreme Court is directly applicable to the State of Louisiana, so far as we are now considering the situation. In Rhode Island it was a contention between two governments, between the old government and what was called the new government established by Mr. Dorr and his friends. The President of the United States, for the purpose of keeping the peace, was called upon to decide which was the government of Rhode Island. He made that decision in obedience to an act of Congress; and now hear what the Supreme Court of the United States had to say in regard to the effect of that decision. I read from the case of Luther vs. Borden, in 7 Howard:

> So, too, as relates to the clause in the above-mentioned article of the Constitution, providing for cases of domestic violence. It rested with Congress, too, to determine upon the means proper to be adopted to fulfill this guarantee. They might, if they had deemed it most advisable to do so, have placed it in the power of a court to decide when the contingency had happened which required the Federal Government to interfere.

Mark the language! Congress might have given the power to decide the question when the Government should intervene, but it did not; it gave it to the President.

> But Congress thought otherwise, and no doubt wisely; and by the act of February 28, 1795, provided that "in case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection."
> By this act the power of deciding whether the exigency had arisen upon which the Government of the United States is bound to interfere, is given to the President. He is to act upon the application of the Legislature or of the executive, and consequently he must determine what body of men constitute the Legislature, and who is the governor, before he can act.

The President must determine which Legislature is the true one, and who is the governor, before he can act. He gets that power from Congress. It has been given to him by an act of Congress, and therefore it is not the exercise of a despotic authority, not an assumption, upon his part, as has been argued for the last year very unjustly, but the power is conferred upon him by Congress to determine who is the governor and which is the Legislature, and in that respect his decision is ours. We must repeal the law before we can take from him the power. The power belongs to him, and the duty is imposed upon him of making that decision until the law is repealed. He has no choice in the matter.

But the court go on to say:

> The fact that both parties claim the right to the government cannot alter the case, for both cannot be entitled to it. If there is an armed conflict, like the one of which we are speaking, it is a case of domestic violence, and one of the parties must be in insurrection against the lawful government. And the President must of necessity decide which is the government, and which party is unlawfully arrayed against it, before he can perform the duty imposed upon him by the act of Congress.
> After the President has acted and called out the militia—

I call the attention of the Senate now to this part of the opinion of the court—

After the President has acted and called out the militia, is a circuit court of the United States authorized to inquire whether his decision was right?

He has made the decision, empowered thereto by an act of Congress; and the court well say, after he has exercised that power, shall a circuit court of the United States inquire whether he has done it properly? And now I inquire of Senato s, is it for the Senate alone to ask the question whether he has made that decision properly? If I concede, for the sake of the argument, that both Houses of Congress by a bill may overrule that decision, I submit that neither House acting by itself has the right to do it.

The President decides, by virtue of an act of Congress, that the Kellogg government is the lawful government. The House of Representatives has decided that Mr. Kellogg is the governor of Louisiana, following the decision of the President of the United States. And now I ask, has the Senate of the United States the right to decide that he is not the governor of Louisiana, and thus to overrule the action of the President to which he has been authorized by an act of Congress? I say no; that while both Houses, by a law, acting under the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, may declare what is the lawful government of Louisiana, it is not competent for either House, acting separately, to overrule the decision of the President of the United States in this matter. The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution declares that the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government. We have exercised that power in regard to the States which were involved in the rebellion. Their case presented the first and the highest ground for the exercise of that great power which was known to the history of this Government. But how was it to be exercised? Exercised by both Houses in the form of a law, to be submitted to the President of the United States for his approval or rejection, not to be exercised by one House alone in any form whatever.

Therefore, I submit, Mr. President, that when the President of the United States, in pursuance of the act of 1795, has made his decision as to which is the lawful government of Louisiana, until that decision is reversed by an act of Congress, passed by both Houses in the usual way, each House is bound separately by that decision. His decision is our decision until it shall have been reversed by an act of Congress.

Now, I want to show in what form the President of the United States has recognized Mr. Kellogg as the governor of Louisiana. I refer to the dispatch sent by the Department of Justice, signed by Mr. Williams as Attorney-General, on the 6th of January last, to the marshal of the United States in Louisiana, sent by order of the President:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, January 6, 1873.

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal, New Orleans, Louisiana:

The report of the committee of two hundred that the President regards the recognition of the existing government as provisional and temporary, is not true. The recognition is final and will be adhered to, unless Congress otherwise provides.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

The President there recognizes the law that Congress has the power otherwise to provide, but the Senate alone has no power otherwise to provide, nor has the House. It cannot be otherwise provided, except by an act of the two Houses in the form of a law. I next read an earlier dispatch sent by the Attorney-General, by order of the President, to Mr. John McEnery, the pretender to the governorship in Louisiana, signed by the Attorney-General:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 13, 1872.

Hon. JOHN MCENERY,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Your visit with a hundred citizens will be unavailing so far as the President is concerned. His decision is made and will not be changed, and the sooner it is acquiesced in the sooner good order and peace will be restored.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

There are two distinct and solemn recognitions of what is known as the Kellogg government, as being the only lawful government in Louisiana; and now, Mr. President, I come to another. I might refer to other dispatches to the same effect, but it is hardly necessary. I ask the Secretary to read the proclamation of the President of the United States, bearing date the 22d day of May, in the year of our Lord 1873, signed by the President, which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas under the pretense that William P. Kellogg, the present executive of Louisiana, and of the officers associated with him in the State administration were not duly elected, certain turbulent and disorderly persons have combined together, with force and arms, to resist the laws and constituted authorities of said State; and whereas it has been duly certified by the proper local authorities, and judicially determined by the inferior and supreme courts of said State, that said officers are entitled to hold their offices respectively, and to execute and discharge the functions thereof; and whereas Congress, at its late session, upon a due consideration of the subject tacitly recognized the said executive and his associates, then, as now, in office, by refusing to take any action with respect thereto; and whereas it is provided in the Constitution of the United States that the United States shall protect every State in this Union, on application of the Legislature or of the executive, when the Legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence; and whereas it is provided in the laws of the United States that in all cases of insurrection in any State, or of obstruction to the laws thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, to call forth the militia of any other State or States; or to employ such part of the land and naval forces as shall be judged necessary for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection, or causing the laws to be duly executed; and whereas the Legislature of said State is not now in session, and cannot be convened in time to meet the present emergency; and the executive of said State, under section 4, of article 4, of the Constitution of the United States, and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, has therefore made application to me for such part of the military force of the United States as may be necessary and adequate to protect said State and the citizens thereof against domestic violence, and to enforce the execution of the laws; and whereas it is required that whenever it may be necessary in the judgment of the President to use the military force for the purpose aforesaid he shall forth with, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective homes within a limited time; now, therefore,

I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby make proclamation, and command such turbulent and disorderly persons to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within twenty days from this date, and hereafter to submit themselves to the laws and constituted authorities of said State; and I invoke the aid and co-operation of all good citizens thereof to uphold the laws and preserve the public peace.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 22d day of May, in the year of our Lord 1873, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-seventh.

U. S. GRANT.

By the President:
J. C. BANCROFT DAVIS,
Acting Secretary of State.

Mr. MORTON. I would call to the recollection of the Senate a message sent us in the month of February, while we were discussing the Louisiana question, in which the President informed Congress that if it did not decide the question he should continue to maintain the Kellogg government as the true and lawful government of Louisiana, as he had done before that time. The President could do nothing else. Congress has never decided that his act was wrong, and there is no power to make that decision except by a law passed under the fourth article of the Constitution. That is the doctrine recognized by the President, and the doctrine we all recognize.

Now, sir, I come to take another step in this argument. Assuming, as I did before, that Governor Kellogg is to be received as the lawful governor of Louisiana, the argument is properly at an end; Pinchback is entitled to take his seat, and any contest that can be made must be made thereafter; and we have no right to keep him out of his seat for one hour on account of any allegation that may be made in regard to fraudulent elections in Louisiana, or bribery, or for any other cause. I now pass to the consideration of the question of the Legislature. It is not necessarily involved in this argument, but still I choose to consider the valid character of the Legislature by which Mr. Pinchback was elected.

In the first place, that Legislature was recognized by the President under the act of Congress, in express words. We are just as much bound by that recognition in regard to the Legislature as we are bound by it in regard to the governor. We are bound by it in regard to both until an act of Congress shall declare that it was wrong and shall declare what is the true Legislature of Louisiana, or whether there is any at all.

The Legislature of Louisiana that elected Mr. Pinchback is the only Legislature in that State; the only one that has ever assumed to act as the Legislature since the election in 1871, except what is known as the McEnery legislature—a body that was a contemptible sham from the beginning—and it will not be seriously pretended upon this floor that General McMillen, elected by that legislature, is entitled to take a seat in this body. There was scarcely a pretense to that in the argument made by counsel before this committee. The argument was that Pinchback was not entitled to take the seat, but not one word was said in the argument in regard to the lawfulness of what is known as the McMillen legislature. It was not organized according to the law of the State, at the time required by the law of the State, at the place required by the law of the State, and had in its organization none of those evidences required by the law of the State.

The Kellogg legislature was organized in accordance with the laws of the State, upon lists of members made out by the secretary of state, as required by law, transmitted to the clerk of the old house, and the secretary of the old senate, as required by law; and upon those lists, as expressly required by the law of the State, the new Legislature was organized at the time and at the place required by law; and as soon as the organization took place, then each house became the judge of the election and qualification of its own members, just as the Senate of the United States has that power. That Legislature acted as the Legislature of the State in every respect; was obeyed as such; its enactments were received as such by the courts, and they have been sustained by the courts without exception, I believe. I have the volume of their laws here. One hundred and nineteen acts of different kinds were passed. They have all been sustained by the courts, and are now being enforced in the State of Louisiana. They are not questioned, and have not been in any court, on the ground that they were not enacted by the proper Legislature. So far as acceptance can go, so far as recognition can go by the courts, by the people, by every department of the State government of Louisiana, that is the accepted and received Legislature of the State, and no other body has any pretension whatever to that character.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the decisions of the supreme court of the State, and I want to remark in the beginning that the supreme court of Louisiana is unquestioned; it is not involved in this conflict at all. Four out of the five members of that court were elected in 1868 and still hold their office; and, notwithstanding some things have been said against that court, I venture to say that it will compare favorably in point of ability and of the character of its members with any of the courts of the States. It is not so numerous a body as the court of New York, and perhaps not so distinguished, because their field has not been so wide, but it is an able and a highly respectable court, and was elected five years ago, and is not involved in this controversy at all. I want to show you first, however, how, in the case of Luther vs. Borden, the Supreme Court of the United States placed stress upon the fact that the supreme court of Rhode Island, which had made certain decisions, was not involved in any controversy. In that case the Supreme Court of the United States said:

It is worthy of remark, however, when we are referring to the authority of State decisions, that the trial of Thomas W. Dorr took place after the constitution of 1843 went into operation. The judges who decided that case held their authority under that constitution; and it is admitted on all hands that it was adopted by the people of the State, and is the lawful and established government. It is the decision, therefore, of a State court, whose judicial authority to decide upon the constitution and laws of Rhode Island is not questioned by either party to this controversy.

There can be no question by either party to this controversy that there is but one supreme court in Louisiana accepted by all parties; and now to show what has been decided by that court let me refer to some cases that have come before it.

In the State of Louisiana ex relatione the Attorney-General, and on the information of the returning officers of election, vs. Jack Wharton et al., A. P. Field, intervenor, (volume 25 of Louisiana Annual Reports, page 2,) the supreme court, after deciding that they had jurisdiction of the cause, (page 14,) say:

Our conclusion is that at the institution of this suit Warmoth, Herron, Lynch, Longstreet, and Hawkins were the legal board of returning officers under the law of 1870 (No. 100) for the election on the 4th day of November, 1872; that the defendants, Wharton, Hatch, and Da Ponte, were intruders; that the injunction against them properly issued; that the act No. 89 of 20th of November, 1873, did not have the effect of abolishing the said board of returning officers, who met on the 12th of November, 1872, and were by the first-mentioned law required to "continue in session" until the returns of said election were completed; and that the judge of the eighth district for the parish of Orleans erred in dissolving the said injunction and dismissing this suit.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the board of returning officers, composed of H. C. Warmoth, F. J. Herron, John Lynch, James Longstreet, and Jacob Hawkins, was the legal board of returning officers of elections of the State of Louisiana, and it is decreed that the judgment of the court a qua be avoided and reversed so far as the appellant is concerned, and that the defendant, appellees, pay cost of this appeal.

In the State ex relatione P. H. Morgan vs. J. H. Kennard, same volume, page 238, the facts were as follows: Associate Justice Howe of the supreme court had resigned during the recess of the senate, and Governor Warmoth had commissioned Mr. Kennard. Subsequently Governor Warmoth was impeached by the Kellogg house of representatives, (the same house which concurred in the election of Mr. Pinchback.) By operation of law Lieutenant-Governor Pinchback became acting governor, nominated Mr. Morgan, and the Kellogg senate, the same senate which participated in the election of Mr. Pinchback, confirmed him as associate justice. The supreme court say, page 243:

On the merits, the question is, have the plaintiffs proved their demand; have they shown that P. H. Morgan was appointed and confirmed to the office of associate justice of the supreme court of the State of Louisiana? The public is concerned in knowing this fact.

To determine that question, it is necessary to know if his appointment was made by the governor of the State, and if that appointment has been confirmed by the senate of the State.

The appointment was made by P. B. S. Pinchback, who signs the commission as acting governor of the State of Louisiana. Was he acting governor of the State? We have no doubt of the fact. He was elected president of the senate in December, 1871, after the death of Lieutenant-Governor Dunn. As such he became lieutenant-governor during the unexpired term of Oscar J. Dunn. Section 1560 of the Digest of the Statutes of this State provides that "in case of the vacancy in the office of governor, the lieutenant-governor shall be governor; in case of vacancy in the office of lieutenant-governor, the senate shall elect a president, who shall be lieutenant-governor." (Page 142.)

The law does not say during his senatorial term, but that he "shall be lieutenant-governor." If the governor had died or resigned the day after, the lieutenant-governor would have become governor. Can it be pretented that under those circumstances the office of governor would have become vacant by the expiration of the time for which P. B. S. Pinchback had been elected a senator? We think not. He was lieutenant-governor when Governor Warmoth was impeached by the house of representatives. During his impeachment the governor was suspended, and the "powers and duties of the office devolved upon the lieutenant-governor." (Constitution of Louisiana, article 53.)

Was the senate which confirmed P. H. Morgan the senate of the State of Louisiana?

It was composed of persons returned as elected to the secretary of state by the returning officers recognized by this court to be the legal returning officers at the late election. (Constitution, article 46.)

It was organized at the state-house by those whose names had been furnished by the secretary of state to the secretary of the senate, in accordance with the election law of this State; it was presided over by the lieutenant-governor, and subsequently it was recognized by the acting governor of the State as a part of the General Assembly. It is tacitly admitted by the defendant that the body of men who confirmed the appointment of Morgan in the senate, for he attacks a law under which this suit is brought, enacted by the General Assembly of which this senate forms a part, not on the ground that the law violates the constitution of the State and of the United States.

Though we have not the power to decide who are the members of the General Assembly, yet we, as judges, are bound to know what assemblage of men constitute the State Legislature, for we are bound to know what are the laws of the State in order to adjudicate upon the rights of litigants under the law.

We are of opinion, therefore, that P. H. Morgan was duly appointed and confirmed associate justice of the supreme court, vice W. W. Howe, resigned.

In the case of the State vs. Jack McFarland, the facts were as follows: McFarland had been indicted for murder, and admitted to bail. Upon his failure to appear, judgment had been entered against him and his sureties upon his bond. A motion was made to set aside the judgment, on the ground that the warrant, arrest, indictment, and bond were all void as having been made and taken by a clerk and sheriff who were commissioned by McEnery when there were a clerk and sheriff duly declared elected by the legal returning board and duly commissioned by the Kellogg government. A statute was invoked which made it criminal to usurp a public office, and defining usurpation to be the assumption of an office without the authority of an election declared by the returning board, or without authority of a commission from the governor of the State. The court reversed the judgment of the court below, which maintained the indictment, and declared null and void the whole proceedings. The court said:

Every official act of S. M. Morrison and J. B. Hawkins is therefore null and void, if they be in the category of persons declared to be usurpers in the first section of act No. 41 of 1873. They do not hold office by virtue of any title having color of authority. They claim to have been elected at the general election of 1872. They never were declared elected by the board of returning officers; neither have they been commissioned. The documents called commissions, purporting to have been issued by Governor Warmoth on the 4th of December, 1872, are absolute nullities, having been issued in violation of law. This we had occasion to decide in the case of Collins vs. Knobloch, and in other cases decided at the last term of this court, at New Orleans. We will notice judicially that no one claiming an office by election in November, 1872, could have been commissioned except by Acting Governor Pinchback or by Governor Kellogg, inasmuch as Governor Warmoth was suspended by being impeached by the house of representatives before the promulgation of the returns of the elections by the returning board, and that his trial was discontinued in consequence of the expiration of his term of office.

It is to be observed here that the Kellogg house of representatives is, eo nomine, declared legal, and the entire Kellogg Legislature recognized as the legitimate Legislature.

In Hughes vs. Pipkins, No. 2081, decided February 24, 1873, there was a contest for a judicial office, conducted under a statute passed by the Kellogg Legislature and approved by Governor Kellogg. The defendant, inter alia, pleaded that "the said pretended law granting this summary proceeding was not passed by a legally constituted Legislature, and that William P. Kellogg, who approved the same, was not the legal governor of Louisiana at the time." The court overruled the plea, and made a final decree determining the title to the office. Here it was absolutely necessary for the court to pass upon the legality of the Kellogg Legislature, and the validity of Mr. Kellogg's title to the office of governor, and they decided that the Kellogg Legislature was the legitimate Legislature, and that Mr. Kellogg, and not Mr. McEnery, was the legal governor.

In Kemp vs. Ellis (the record being still in manuscript) the supreme court recognize the validity of the Kellogg government, and the validity of Governor Kellogg's commissions.

Mr. President, I submit this proposition, that the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana upon any question that arises under the constitution and laws of that State is binding upon the Government of the United States in its dealings with that State, and that you can maintain the government of these States upon no other ground. You are bound to accept the decisions of State tribunals on all questions arising upon State laws. There are appeals allowed from the decisions of the State courts in cases where a statute of the United States or any question under the Constitution of the United States is involved; but there is no appeal allowed in any case that arises exclusively under the constitution or laws of the State of Louisiana. Therefore, when that State comes to pass on the legality of the returning board, to say who are the particular officers to count the votes in Louisiana, there is no appeal from the decision of that court to the Supreme Court of the United States or to any other tribunal. It is a question arising exclusively under the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana, and their own State tribunals must be allowed to decide it finally and for all. I do not believe in the doctrine of State sovereignty, as many of you know; I have had occasion to resist that doctrine, and I do now; but I believe in the doctrine of State rights. I believe the States have rights sacred and unapproachable that are inviolable and that we have no right to encroach upon, and that among these rights is the right of the State, by its own tribunals, to decide upon the questions arising under the constitution and laws of the State not involving the statutes or the Constitution of the United States. If the States have not that right, then there is an end to State governments. They have that right; and when they have made their decision, the courts of the United States and the Congress of the United States are bound to follow it.

I will first read from the case of Luther vs. Borden again on that subject a brief extract:

The point, then, raised here has been already decided by the courts of Rhode Island. The question relates altogether to the constitution and laws of that State, and the well-settled rule in this court is, that the courts of the United States adopt and follow the decisions of the State courts in questions which concern merely the constitution and laws of the State.

Upon what ground could the circuit court of the United States which tried this case have departed from this rule, and disregarded and overruled the decisions of the courts of Rhode Island? Undoubtedly the courts of the United States have certain powers under the Constitution and laws of the United States which do not belong to the State courts; but the power of determining that a State government has been lawfully established, which the courts of the State disown and repudiate, is not one of them.

And so it would be with the converse of that proposition. The power to determine that a State government is not lawful when the courts of that State have decided that it is would not be within the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States.

> Upon such a question the courts of the United States are bound to follow the decisions of the State tribunals, and must therefore regard the charter government as the lawful and established government during the time of this contest.

I will read an extract from an opinion in 14 Howard, in the case of Webster vs. Cooper:

> The question has usually been concerning the construction of a statute of a State; but we think there is no sound distinction between the construction of a law enacted by the Legislature of a State and the construction of the organic law ordained by the people themselves. The exposition of both belongs to the judicial department of the government of the State, and its decision is final and binding upon all other departments of the government, and upon the people themselves, until they see fit to change their constitution, and this court receives such a settled construction as part of the fundamental law of the State.

And, Mr. President, when the courts of the United States are bound by the decisions of the State courts, and cannot depart from them, and must accept their construction of their statutes and of their constitution as a part of the fundamental law, I ask you can this body sitting as a court—for, mark you, we are in that character to-day—disregard the decisions of the supreme court of a State, and give a different construction to their constitution and laws?

Mr. STOCKTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana a question, with his permission.

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. STOCKTON. I do not know that I really understand him. The assumption of all the cases he has read, the whole application of them is, that the question before us concerns only the laws of a State, which he asserts that, as a general rule, the courts of the United States will follow. Do I understand him correctly as holding that the question whether the Kellogg government was established, and whether that was a legal Legislature, does in no way concern the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. MORTON. Why, Mr. President, it may affect the whole country; but the question as to which is the Legislature of Louisiana is a question arising entirely under her constitution and laws. The Senator cannot deny that for a moment; and therefore to the courts of Louisiana must be left the decision of that question.

Mr. STOCKTON. Let me ask the Senator another question. The Senate of the United States having the sole power, under the Constitution of the United States, to decide whether a Legislature has chosen a Senator, when it undertakes in the exercise of that power to decide whether a particular body was the Legislature, is not the question of the construction of the Constitution of the United States directly before the Senate, and is not the question whether that is a Legislature directly before the Senate?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly not, Mr. President. We are to take the Legislature as the State gives it to us. The Constitution of the United States says that each State shall be entitled to two Senators chosen by the Legislature of the State, and it is for the State to determine what is the Legislature; and when they have fixed it we are bound to take it. Whether the Legislature has actually made the election or not is a question we can inquire into; whether there was a quorum or not there we can inquire into; but as to whether it is the Legislature, we must take it as the State gives it to us. If the supreme court of that State decide that the Kellogg legislature is the true one, I ask upon what principle can we call that in question? That is a proper question for the supreme court to decide. When a law is presented to that court upon which they must adjudicate, they must pass upon the question as to whether it was enacted by the proper Legislature; they must take notice of that fact. Suppose there are two legislatures in the State at the time, each claiming to be the proper one, and a law passed by one comes before the supreme court; the supreme court, in deciding whether that law is binding, must take notice that it was enacted by the true Legislature. They cannot pass upon that question without deciding the other point, was it enacted by the true Legislature? Therefore, that question is a proper one for the State court, and when they decide it every other department of that State government is bound by it; the people are bound by it; no other legislature has a right to elect a Senator; and we are just as much bound by it.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I am answered. That is precisely the point that I wished to ascertain, whether the Senator took that ground. I should like now to refer him to the appointment of a joint committee on reconstruction by the two Houses of Congress, and the submission of the credentials of Senators to that committee, who were to report whether the legislatures choosing those Senators were proper Legislatures in the Union. That question was submitted to a joint committee of both Houses, and the whole legislation of Congress since the war ceased in regard to those States has been shaped by that action. I ask him whether that went on the ground that a State supreme court, and that alone, could properly decide whether the State government was properly established, and whether it was in the Union?

Mr. MORTON. I am very glad that my friend from New Jersey makes that suggestion, because it brings up the whole matter broadly upon the question of reconstruction, and whether there were State governments in the States involved in the rebellion or not. That was a question proper to be decided by the Congress of the United States under that clause of the Constitution which says that the United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government. A joint committee was appointed under that power. It was a joint committee; it was not the committee of one House. It was a joint question, a question looking to legislation, and we did legislate. We did declare that there were no legal State governments down there which we were bound to receive as such. We overturned their pretended State governments and we created new ones, not by virtue of the action of the Senate alone or of the House alone, but by virtue of an act of Congress passed by both Houses, and submitted to the President of the United States. There is the law. That is the broad distinction which the Senator does not take. I agree that that action was constitutional; it was right and proper in itself; but it was in the exercise of a great power that does not belong to either House alone, but belongs to the whole Congress of the United States.

Mr. ALCORN. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to ask him a single question, and that is whether the courts will not always necessarily recognize the de facto political organization of the government, and whether to deny that on the part of the supreme court of a State would not deny the very authority by virtue of which they are in existence? I ask, in other words, whether the supreme court of a State will not always recognize the Legislature as it exists, the de facto government as it exists?

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, if I admit that, that does not affect this proposition. The courts will recognize the acting and existing Legislature, just as we ought to do in this case. There is but one Legislature in Louisiana that has been enacting laws for the last twelve months, and we ought to recognize it, and every court would recognize it unquestionably. Certainly the courts will treat de facto governments as governments de jure, in the absence of authority to the contrary. Governments cannot be carried on in any other way. But I am discussing this other question, that when the tribunals of a State have settled the character of the government, have determined which is the true Legislature, have determined who is the governor of the State, as the supreme court of Louisiana have time and time again, we are bound by it until by the joint action of the two Houses of Congress, in the form of a law, it is declared that that is not the true government.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question on that point?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand the Senator to say that when the supreme court of a State recognizes the legality of the existing legislative body, that decision is obligatory on every department of the Government, and is binding on the Senate of the United States. I wish to ask him this question in connection with that position: If the Senate of the United States by evidence uncontradicted, irrefutable, convincing, and overwhelming, is satisfied that the body which has been recognized by the supreme court of the State is a revolutionary body, that it has no legal existence—if facts come within the knowledge of the Senate convincing them that such is the case, I ask, then, whether the recognition of the legality of the government by the supreme court of the State would be binding and obligatory on the Senate of the United States?

Mr. MORTON. Unquestionably it would. Governments cannot be organized without providing certain tribunals to decide a certain class of questions, and when they have decided those questions it is not for other tribunals that have not jurisdiction to undertake to decide them, because they say the first tribunal has decided them wrongfully. Murder is a great crime, but it is not every court that can punish the crime of murder. One court cannot assume jurisdiction to punish the crime of murder because another has failed to do it. No matter what our convictions may be, the question is, is that thing submitted to our determination? Why, sir, we may be satisfied that a returning board in the State of Louisiana had not the proper returns before them, or that they made a false return, but that is not a a question for our decision; that is not a question for the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana unless there is some law authorizing that court to decide it. We may be satisfied that the courts of New Jersey have decided questions wrongfully; but does that give us power over their decisions? Certainly not. We must abide by the decisions of those tribunals to which jurisdiction is given by the law, whether in our private judgments we believe those decisions are right or not. We cannot carry on a State or the General Government upon any other principle. It is not at all important for us to inquire whether, in our judgment, the legislature of Louisiana that elected Pinchback was in point of fact the true Legislature or not. We may say the supreme court of that State decided wrongfully. I have no doubt my friend from New Jersey thinks so, for he is a sincere man. But, sir, although we may think that, we have no power, no right, to overrule their decision, because that is anarchy. If we may do it in one case we may do it in every other case. If we are bound by the decision of no tribunal, provided we think the decision of that tribunal is wrong, that makes the Senate a law unto itself, and carried into society it makes every man a law unto himself and a rebel to society and a rebel to all government.

Mr. STOCKTON. I dislike very much to interrupt the Senator from Indiana, and I would not do so at all if he had not concluded his answer by asking me if I was answered; and if I should remain silent, perhaps he might suppose that I was answered.

Mr. MORTON. I did not intend to invite an answer, but I am willing to hear it.

Mr. STOCKTON. I was answered courteously, pleasantly, and very agreeably, but not satisfactorily to my reasoning powers. I asked the Senator whether, when the Senate of the United States was acting under that clause of the Constitution which made it the judge of the election and returns of its members, and it became its duty as judge to decide whether it was a Legislature which elected or chose the Senator, it had not the absolute power, inherent in itself as a Senate, belonging to no other department of the Government, to decide whether that was the Legislature of the State? He had said that the President decided. He had taken that ground, which I shall not reply to now, but may at some other time. He had also taken the ground that it was the State courts which should decide, and that the Supreme Court of the United States and Congress and all other bodies were bound by the decision of the State court. I tried to call his attention to the fact that it was no law of Congress, but the Constitution of the United States, the highest law of the land, that made it our solemn duty to say whether that was a Legislature. Then I referred him to the reconstruction acts where Congress had examined into that question. His answer is, that that was done by Congress acting together; it was not by a separate committee, but a joint committee of both Houses. That is true. That is what I said; but the question still remains: an act of Congress cannot override the Constitution. No act of Congress, no act of the President, no act of a State court, no act of any power on this earth can override that simple clause of the Constitution that the Senator is to be chosen by the Legislature of the State, and if the Senate of the United States under that power cannot ask whether the body sending a man here was the Legislature, the clause is absolutely nugatory. In all the discussions that have taken place—in Harlan's case, in the cases before his time and since his time, in the arguments of Mr. Badger and Mr. Bayard, the whole way through—all the great constitutional lawyers have maintained the position, and I doubt whether it has ever been successfully disputed, that we had a right to examine whether the body that made the choice was a Legislature. In Harlan's case, was it not the question whether it was a Legislature or a mob? They had not gone into joint meeting by a proper resolution; the majority of the members of the Legislature was there; but it was held that it was not a Legislature, but a mob. Who were the judges? The Senate of the United States, and they alone.

I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not mean to make a speech, but only to state my point so that he could understand it.

Mr. MORTON. While I might agree with the general proposition of the Senator that we must take a Senator chosen by the Legislature of the State, yet when I come to inquire as to the evidences as to what is the Legislature of the State, I am not at liberty to judge at random. I may refuse to do anything here as a Senator, but I am bound by my conscience and my oath to act in conformity to law and the principles of justice. If the State presents to me a Legislature and says "This is the body that makes laws in Louisiana," I am not at liberty to say, "You are mistaken; you do not understand yourself; that is not a Legislature." That is the point, and that point has always been maintained.

Now let me point out to my friend from New Jersey how absurd and how ridiculous would be our position if the other rule prevailed. The President has determined who is the governor and which is the Legislature of Louisiana. He has made an irrevocable decision. We are bound by it, as I have before argued, until it is reversed by an act of Congress. Upon that point there can be no dispute. Upon that point there can be no answer. But I will assume that the President has decided only for himself. Then the House of Representatives come in and agree with the President, as they have done. They have recognized Kellogg as the governor of Louisiana; and now the Senate comes in and says, "We are not bound by the supreme court of Louisiana; we are not bound by the President; we are not bound by anything but our own caprices, and we will recognize the McEnery government, and we accept the Senator from the McEnery government." The Senator smiles at the ridiculousness, the absurdity of our position under those circumstances.

Mr. STOCKTON. I smiled because the Senator substituted for "the Constitution of the United States" the words "our own caprices." I suppose with many gentlemen in this body, and himself in particular, his own caprices have often been placed in lieu of the Constitution of the United States, but it is not so with some of us.

Mr. MORTON. I will not answer the Senator on that point. The Senator understands my position. I am only arguing to show that upon his ground there would be anarchy.

Now, Mr. President, I propose to read an authority upon this subject. When my friend said that Mr. Clay and Mr. Webster had recognized his doctrine, I submit that he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. STOCKTON. The Senator did not understand me. I said Mr. Badger and Mr. Bayard.

Mr. MORTON. They never recognized any such doctrine; but, on the contrary, Mr. Clay recognized just the reverse. Now I propose to read an extract from the report of the majority of the committee in the Rhode Island case that I before referred to. After Mr. Robbins had been seated, as Pinchback is entitled to be seated here—and he is wronged and the State of Louisiana is wronged every day that he is kept out of his seat—the majority of the committee made a report which was adopted by the Senate, and I call the attention of the Senate to the reasoning in that report as absolutely conclusive, in my judgment. I beg the attention of the Senate to the language of this majority report that was adopted by the Senate in the decision of that case. They say:

> The Constitution of the United States expressly declares that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof." But what is the definition of the term legislature? Both its literal and technical meaning is "the power that makes laws." It is the highest attribute of sovereignty, and merges all other powers when it does not transcend the limitations contained in the fundamental constitution of the State. When, therefore, we find that, during the existence of the General Assembly one branch of which was continued and held their seats by virtue of the law of January, 1832, this legislature passed fourteen laws of a general nature, and twenty-eight private acts, many of them acts of incorporation, besides numerous resolutions on various subjects falling within the range of legislative power, a schedule of which is hereunto annexed, marked C; and when these laws and resolutions remain on the statute-book of Rhode Island in full force and effect, sanctioned by judicial decisions, and tacitly submitted to by the people over whom they operate, it would seem to your committee—> a very dangerous assumption of power in one branch of Congress, or even in every department of the General Government combined, to interfere with the internal regulations of the State, and to denounce the body by which these laws and resolutions were passed as a mere assemblage of citizens without any public authority whatever, and not the Legislature of the State.

That is law, every word of it, so manifestly so that it does not admit of an answer for a moment.

> Such a power does not belong to the Federal Government, and would, if claimed and carried out to its full extent, annihilate all the reserved rights of the States.

I should like to know what my democratic friends have to say on the subject of State rights.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to ask him whether that report was not predicated upon the existence of one legislative body alone, and whether at that time there were within the State two bodies claiming to be the lawful Legislature?

Mr. MORTON. I will come to that presently. That is wholly immaterial, as I will show to the Senator. I was remarking about State rights. While there are those who contend for the doctrine of State sovereignty, the doctrine of strict construction, and who deny to the Government of the United States those powers that are absolutely necessary to carry it on, I hope that none of those men will be found willing to deny the State any rights for the sake of keeping a political antagonist out of power; because to deny the right of the State tribunal to settle all these questions, the right of the returning board, which was the proper Legislature, and all the other questions which have been raised, is to strike at the very existence of the State governments, and, as the committee says here, to "annihilate them," and I agree with that committee entirely.

> It is a general principle of national law, applicable to all distinct and independent governments, that if there arise any disputes in a State on the fundamental laws and public administration, or on the prerogatives of the different powers of which it is composed, it is the business of the State alone to judge and determine them in conformity to its political constitution.

Why, sir, that proposition ought to command universal assent by the mere statement of it. Argument ought to be entirely superfluous to sustain a proposition of that kind.

> No government has a right to intrude into the domestic affairs of another State and attempt to influence its deliberations or to control its action. This principle is recognized in the Constitution of the United States, by which the respective States united and formed themselves into a federal republic.
> Conceding, as we feel bound to do, to the State of Rhode Island, in common with all the other States of the Union, the power to decide for itself all questions relating to its domestic policy, there would seem to be no ground on which to rest a doubt that she has decided, in the most solemn manner, the character and powers of the body by which Mr. Robbins was chosen a Senator to Congress. They—> passed numerous laws which are in full force. They elected judges of the supreme court of the State, who have taken a new engagement or oath of office and accepted new commissions from the governor, entered on their official duties, and condemned to death a citizen found guilty of a capital offense against the laws of the State. They received compensation out of the treasury of the State for their services, and disbursed the public money necessary for the support of the government.

Mr. President, if that report had been written upon this case, it could not apply to it more directly and more powerfully than it does. Now, I want to come to a remark in this report referred to by my friend from Delaware, and to which there seems to be some importance attached, because I find an additional brief from the counsel upon the other side, laid upon our tables, calling our attention to it. They say:

> If there had existed another body of men, however chosen, contending for the offices of the governor and senators in the State, it would not be denied that their respective rights might be the subject of inquiry in deciding a contested election in the Senate of the United States.

There was no such case there. It is a mere passing remark, and it is entirely true. If they were called upon to decide between these two conflicting bodies, how would they do it? Would they do it by going back and inquiring as to the result at the polls? Would they do it by going back and seeing whether the votes had been counted right? They would do it by finding out which of those two governments had been accepted by the State. The State has power to determine that question for itself.

The report in which this remark was made was in the final contest in the Senate, after Robbins had been seated on his "prima facie case," and, according to the decision of the Senate in that very case, Robbins's credentials being regular, could not be raised nor any other, until after Robbins had been seated.

Why, sir, in the course of the argument of counsel before the committee, I asked the question of one of the counsel, arguing with ability and eloquence, if the State had no power to decide between two contending Legislatures in Louisiana, if there was no tribunal in the State to decide that question; and he was driven to answer no; that where there are two Legislatures in a State, each claiming to be the proper one, there was no power in the State, no power in the supreme court of the State, or in any tribunal, to settle that question; so that whenever any State gets into that unfortunate condition hereafter she is helpless; she is in a state of anarchy, and she must come to Congress to settle it. The answer was absurd. Such a difficulty as that is the precise and proper case to be adjudicated by the supreme court of the State. It becomes a law question of the highest character; and if a State has no court that can decide a question of that kind, that State has got no government. That is all there is of that.

Now, Mr. President, I believe I have gone over all the points I intend to make to-day. I intended to present simply the argument upon the law of this case. I have been advised that this case is to be made a political one, that everything is to be dragged into it, and that it is to be made the medium of an attack upon the Administration for what it has done in connection with the Kellogg government. I hope not. We are sitting as a court, and, for one, I propose to decide this question upon the law, and I will always do that when I am placed in the position I am now, without regard to the politics of the applicant. I think I have given some proof of it. I have too much respect for myself to attempt to twist the law to keep a democrat out or to put a republican in. There can be no higher duty that a Senator owes than to decide this question of law correctly. That which is good law for the admission of a Senator of one politics ought always to be good law for the admission of a Senator of different politics, and, so far as I am concerned, I intend to decide this question, and have argued it, according to my convictions. But if there be Senators here who are determined to travel out of this field and go into the field of politics in Louisiana, I beg leave to say that I think I shall be able to follow them. I am somewhat conversant with the political history of that State for the last six or seven years, and have paid special attention to it. While there are some things in that volume of testimony of importance, that volume does not contain it all. There is more valuable knowledge in regard to the election of 1872 outside of that volume than there is in it, and much that is more applicable too, I can say to Senators, than all the evidence in that volume. Whatever may have been the conclusions of the majority of the committee—and I was a minority on the committee at that time and dissented from the views of the majority on those points—the majority of the committee declared that the election in 1872 was an organized fraud, and was void in consequence of it. I dissented from that opinion, not because the election was not an organized fraud, for I declared that it was, but I dissented from the conclusion that it was void. I said it was not void upon that ground; but it was an organized fraud, and since that time that fraud in all its hideous and terrible deformity has been developed. The most stupendous, the most elaborate, the most ingenious scheme of fraud for carrying an election known to the history of American politics and worthy of its distinguished and somewhat notorious author is all developed, and I am now in possession of it. I have seen the original papers, the dispatches, the letters, the instructions, and the whole scheme as concocted from day to day, and as finally carried out, by which an acknowledged and notorious republican majority of some fifteen thousand or twenty thousand was apparently overcome by reports that were said to be the official reports of that election. I can show, if it shall become necessary, before the Senate, I think to the satisfaction of every man whose mind is impartial, that of the tickets actually put into the boxes on that day, a majority of them were republican tickets.

I have only made these remarks in anticipation of what I have understood was to be said in the course of the debate. I do not desire to go into that subject. It is not legitimate. The question as to whether Mr. Pinchback has a prima facie case is a question of law, and but for the intimations that have been given I should have referred to nothing else.

Mr. President, I have now said all that I intend to say at this stage of this proceeding.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President——

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE. If the Senator from New Jersey will allow me, I merely want to correct an error made by the Senator from Indiana in relation to my own case.

Mr. STOCKTON. I yield the floor to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREERY] who, I understand, wishes to make a remark.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will yield to me for five minutes, not on the main question.

Mr. MCCREERY. I may yield altogether after I make a simple statement. I desire to make a few observations upon the controversy now before the Senate under the proposition of the Senator from Indiana. I believe there is no one else wishing to address the Senate at this time; and by their indulgence I would request that this matter be laid over until to-morrow morning, with a view that I may then have an opportunity of addressing the Senate for an hour or so on the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from New York [Mr. FENTON] has indicated a desire to speak on another subject to-morrow, and if the Senators can harmonize their views I have no objection. The Senator from Kentucky having given notice that he desires to speak to-morrow at one o'clock, of course the Chair will recognize him. At any rate I will move that the pending resolution be postponed until to-morrow, and that the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance be taken up.

Mr. MCCREERY. With the understanding that I shall be allowed to address the Senate to-morrow, I have no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from New York desires to speak on the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Alabama if he desires to say anything on the pending resolution.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE. I simply rise for the purpose of correcting an error on the part of the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, in the chair.) The question is on postponing the pending resolution until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Alabama if he desires to speak now.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE. I only wish, before this question passes from the Senate to-day, to correct an error into which the Senator from Indiana has fallen with reference to my own case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw his motion?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; if the Senator from Alabama desires to proceed now.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Indiana, alluding to my own case, to refer to it as illustrative, and perhaps conclusive, upon the principle which he was arguing, that the certificate which has been produced before the Senate must be regarded as prima facie evidence to sustain the right of the claimant to a seat in the Senate. I do not at all differ from the Senator so far as that principle is concerned; but as he referred to my own case to illustrate the principle, and regarded it as being sustained by that case, I must respectfully dissent from any such conclusion. If it shows anything whatever it shows precisely the reverse.

What were the facts in my own case? Let me state them. I was elected to the Senate in January, 1871, for the term beginning March 4 of that year. In March I presented myself with my credentials here; indeed, my credentials had been laid before the Senate and filed before I presented myself on the floor of the Senate. An objection to my admission was made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] on the ground of a protest signed, if I recollect aright, by forty-one or forty-two members of the Legislature by which I was elected. The ground taken in the protest which was presented was simply this: That I was elected by a bare majority, and that one of the members of that majority who voted for me was subsequently displaced upon a contest. Upon that showing, my prima facie evidence contained in the certificate of the governor, in full compliance with the law of 1866, was set aside. The case was passed over. It was brought up occasionally time and again until, I think, about the 10th of January, 1872. Every time it came up, with this certificate of record here, it was pertinaciously objected to by gentlemen. There was not a single iota of proof taken in support of the grounds, insufficient as they were, which were alleged in the protest. It was not until January, 1872, nearly nine months after the presentation of my credentials, that I was admitted, and I was then admitted not so much upon the force of my credentials, for I was kept out for nine months, as upon there being no evidence whatever to sustain the protest.

While I concede very fully and clearly that credentials signed by the governor make a prima facie case in the first instance, yet, if there is evidence, as I contended at the last session, before the Senate which goes to overbalance, outweigh, contradict that prima facie evidence, then, according to every rule applicable to prima facie evidence, it is not sustained. If there is sufficient evidence before the Senate in the voluminous report of the committee, made at the last session, to convince Senators, to rebut and outweigh the prima facie evidence arising from the certificate of the governor, then, according to the precedent established in my own case, the evidence of the certificate loses its force.

Mr. LEWIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that motion is put, I move that the pending resolution be laid upon the table and that the resolution in regard to specie payments be taken up, with a view to leaving it as the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia withdraw his motion?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the pending resolution lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

SPECIE PAYMENTS—THE CURRENCY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the Senate resume the resolution reported from the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of taking the floor upon the resolution; and now I will give way to the Senator from Virginia to make his motion to go into executive session.

REPEAL OF BANKRUPT LAW.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 792) to repeal an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read a first time by its title; and its second reading to-day was objected to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LEWIS. I renew the motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 16, 1873.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE P. HAYS, D. D., president of Washington and Jefferson College, Washington, Pennsylvania.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REFORM OF THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service be instructed to inquire, first, whether any reduction can be made in the cost to the people of the civil service of the Government, both in the number of officials employed and in the compensation paid to such officials, without impairing the efficiency of the service; and, second, as to the expediency of providing that all officials in the civil service shall receive as compensation only such salaries as shall be fixed and determined by law, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUBSIDIES TO RAILROADS.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the several railroad companies hereinafter named have received from the United States, by authority of the act of Congress of July 1, 1862, and the several acts amendatory thereof, money subsidies to aid in the construction of their several roads, as follows: to the Central Pacific, $25,885,120; to the Kansas Pacific, $6,303,000; to the Union Pacific, $27,236,512; to the Central Branch, Union Pacific, $1,600,000; to the Western Pacific, $1,970,560; and to the Sioux City and Pacific, $1,628,320—making a grand total of $64,623,512; and said several railroad companies have agreed to pay back said advances, together with the interest due thereon, the United States holding a second mortgage upon said roads to secure the repayment and interest; and whereas the said railroad companies have heretofore refused and omitted, and still do refuse, to pay to the United States their proportions of interest heretofore accruing, or any portion thereof; and whereas the United States has paid or advanced the sum of $20,447,986.25 interest for said several railroad companies, and there remains yet unpaid interest to the amount of $1,292,470.20: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Judiciary Committee is hereby instructed to report a bill authorizing and requiring the Attorney-General of the United States to institute and prosecute the requisite legal proceedings to enforce the immediate payment of such accrued or accruing interest.

Mr. SYPHER. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to have action taken on a bill which has come back from the Senate with amendments.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the House resumes the consideration of the bill to repeal the bankrupt act, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.]

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me that I may offer a resolution.

The SPEAKER. If the regular order be demanded it is the duty of the Chair to enforce it. The Chair cannot permit the interruption of business after the regular order of business is demanded; otherwise the business of the House will get into confusion. The gentleman who has the floor on the bill before the House is not allowed to yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I supposed otherwise; but I shall be satisfied if the Chair will recognize me after this order is disposed of.

REPEAL OF BANKRUPT LAW.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 792) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto. The two hours to be devoted to the discussion of the bill now begin at twenty minutes after twelve. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] is entitled to fifteen minutes.

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Judiciary did not deem it important or necessary to prepare a report accompanying this bill to explain and vindicate their action. It therefore seems to devolve upon me to explain, with all the brevity and clearness that I may command, the general purpose of the bill and the principles and reasons upon which it is based.

The House will remember that the President, in his annual message to Congress, recommended the repeal of the bankrupt law. It will not be necessary for me to recall or reproduce that portion of the message which relates to the subject. In concise but comprehensive language the President explains the ground upon which this law ought to be repealed and the evils under which the commercial community is suffering by reason of its existence. While concurring entirely in the correctness and justice of the presidential statement, it is believed that the strength of the objections to this bill has only been partially stated by the President. Entire unanimity of sentiment, I believe, existed on the part of the committee as to the existence of serious defects and imperfections in the existing law. The only question upon which differences exist was, whether we should attempt to meet these defects and imperfections by an amendment or by an absolute repeal of the law; and the committee, or at least the majority of them, was strongly impressed with the conviction that this law was so defective, so radically defective, and there were so many remedies proposed, that it would be difficult to bring about a unanimity of sentiment in regard to it; and possibly, by reason of a conflict of action between the two Houses, no relief could be procured—at all events that great delay would result, and meanwhile, as the bankrupt law remained in force, the country would be deprived of the relief which it demanded.

Two questions arose as to the involuntary and the voluntary branches of the bankrupt law. Under the law, as it now stands, any trader or merchant is liable to have his estate thrown into bankruptcy, his pecuniary credit and reputation ruined, and his property subjected to ruinous losses and sacrifices, in cases where he is perfectly solvent in the legal sense of the term, where 95 per cent. of his creditors may be averse to any such forcible measure; where, if a reasonable time were allowed, he might make an arrangement to pay all his debts and have a handsome surplus left, and where no act of fraud, either by omission or commission, was alleged to have been committed by him.

No bankrupt law on earth has been so severe as this. The English bankrupt law, of which this is said to be a copy, has no such odious and obnoxious provisions. It is enough that any man's commercial paper shall remain unpaid for fourteen days; no matter though he may have been prevented from payment by such sickness that it would be unsafe to have any business relations with him, or by any other unavoidable necessity; no matter though the banks, as they have recently done, withheld from him their usual facilities, if for fourteen days he fails to meet his commercial paper his estate is liable to be thrown into bankruptcy.

The committee believe that the fact that such a law has remained upon the statute-books of the United States for six years is evidence of the great toleration, forbearance, and generosity of the American people. It is believed that the compulsory operations of this law, and the fact of its existence, tended very greatly to aggravate the recent panic, commencing in New York, extending to other commercial centers, and finally prevailing to a greater or less extent throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Under the present bankrupt law the moment a petition is filed the Federal judge has power, upon ex parte statements, without security, to issue an injunction and order a restraint of the disposition of any property which the alleged bankrupt may have made in good faith, the validity of which is challenged; and in a recent instance $10,000,000 worth of securities was thus tied up in New York on the ex parte order of the Federal judge, acting in entire accordance with the provisions of this law, when those securities consisted of stocks and the markets were falling. By means of that injunction it is alleged that many men were injured and others absolutely ruined.

The conflict that exists throughout the bankrupt courts of the country tends to increase this embarrassment. The law does not allow a transfer to be made in good faith, by way of security or sale or payment or hypothecation, within a certain period of time before the bankrupt petition is filed. The property is all liable to be overhauled and brought into the maelstrom of the bankrupt court.

The great argument in favor of this law has been that it is necessary to have equality among creditors, and to destroy preferences, to put all creditors upon the same footing. The committee have found and believe that the general experience of the country has been that when an estate is thrown into bankruptcy it is eaten up by charges and expenses. In the city of New Orleans, out of eighteen hundred bankrupt cases, it is said that in only one was any dividend realized. The experience in the great commercial emporium of New York, which I have the honor to represent, is substantially to the same effect. It is so all over the State of New York. There is an old Latin maxim that nothing comes from nothing, and it is undoubtedly true that when you have nothing to distribute all the creditors entitled to dividends stand upon an absolute equality. And this, it is believed, is the only equality secured under the operation of this bankrupt law.

The involuntary clause is ostensibly for the benefit of the creditor. Now it is believed that the creditors of the country do not desire it. Nay, with entire unanimity—I speak at all events for the commercial classes of New York—they demand its repeal. The question before the committee, then, was whether we should retain the voluntary clause. It was believed that an attempt to amend the law would result in delay and a failure to accomplish any real good. I think, however, the voluntary clause stands an anomaly as now framed in the history of Federal legislation. The English bankrupt law has no voluntary clause.

We have in three great emergencies had a bankrupt law with the voluntary clause, and allowed it to stand in this country; but that has been always after some great commercial revulsion or embarrassment, when the debtor had no other means of relieving himself from pecuniary embarrassment, and it was desired to clear the decks and give him an opportunity once more to commence business. But these laws have always been temporary and casual in their operation. In 1816 a bankrupt law was passed, but it existed only about a year. In 1841, after the revulsion of 1837 and 1838, another law was passed, which was repealed at the end of one year. The present law stood only for about two years, so as to allow of an absolute discharge on giving up the entire property. I believe I am correct in saying that if you are to have a voluntary bankrupt law, you should have one where the debtor, when he surrenders all his property and is guilty of no fraud, should be discharged.

The present law, approved in March, 1867, was amended on the 22d of July, 1868, by providing that in all petitions filed after the 1st of January, 1869, a debtor should receive no discharge unless his estate paid 50 per cent. of his liabilities. On the 14th of July, 1870, it was again amended by declaring that the provisions of the amendment of 1868 should not apply to debts incurred prior to January 1, 1869. You now, therefore, have upon your statute-book a law providing that no bankrupt shall receive his final discharge unless his estate pays 50 per cent. of his liabilities.

The question presented to us is whether you ought to make that provision permanent. The committee did not believe that it was according to the theory and genius of our Government that that should be done. But if the sense of Congress is otherwise, the repeal of this law will present no impediment to the introduction and establishment of a uniform system of bankruptcy that shall contain all the essential elements in relation to a voluntary bankrupt law.

Therefore the committee have reported a bill for the absolute repeal of the law, both as to voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy. If this bill pass no future petitions can be filed after the law takes effect. We have adopted the bill introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PARSONS] so far as it relates to the first clause, and we have carefully incorporated other provisions upon it to secure all rights in pending cases.

With the single exception provided for in the bill all cases shall pass through under the existing law, voluntary or involuntary, except so far as the disposition of the property is modified by this bill. We do not believe that a majority in numbers should prevent a majority in interest from controlling the affairs of the bankrupt, any more than we believe that a majority in numbers of the stockholders of a bank or corporation should be permitted to overrule a majority in interest. We do not believe that ten men representing a majority in numbers should control nine men representing a majority in interest. We give to the majority the control of the disposition of the property, so that the management as to extension of time, or compromises, or other arrangements, may be carried out.

I will simply say, in conclusion, that in my judgment no measure of relief that this Congress can pass will be hailed with such satisfaction as the repeal of the bankrupt law. Speaking for the commercial community of New York, with whom for the last two months I had opportunities of frequent intercourse; speaking for the legal profession of my State, and speaking for my entire constituency of the Empire State, I ask from this House the prompt passage of this bill; and in my judgment we can do no more grateful act than to pass it promptly, by an overwhelming majority, before the holidays. Let the Senate concur in it—although perhaps it is too much to expect that they will do it before the holidays—and we have reason to believe that it will receive the immediate approval of the Executive. I hope the House will respond to the demand of the Executive, to the demands of the commercial community, to the demands of the business interests throughout the country; and the action of the House will be hailed with acclamation and joy by the commercial interests throughout the length and breadth of the country, from its center to its circumference.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the House started yesterday in hot haste to do an act which, in my humble judgment, it will, if it is done, be called upon at an early day to undo. On the 18th of September last the banking-house of Jay Cooke & Co. failed, and to the reckless management of that firm, its hazarding the money of its depositors upon imaginary securities, is to be directly attributed the present financial condition of the country—wrecked fortunes, closed manufactories, thousands upon thousands of laboring men thrown out of employment in the winter season of the year, the prices of the produce, which is the result of a whole year's labor of the agriculturists, diminished, until it aggregates millions of loss to them; these wide-spread calamities are sprouts out of the management of that firm. Yet, sir, hardly had the Speaker announced the organization of the Forty-third Congress, until the lawyers of Jay Cooke & Co. bring upon this floor the bill the substance of which it was proposed on yesterday to pass under a suspension of the rules, without any debate or opportunity of explanation, and which it is now proposed to enact into a law. So that once more that concern is to make itself felt by the country, and, I fear, once more for evil.

The title to this bill ought to be amended. It should be called a bill to embarrass justice. It is impossible in the fifteen minutes to which I am limited to analyze the provisions of this bill, containing seven sections; but I especially call the attention of the House to one or two things that may be done.

A majority in value of the creditors of Jay Cooke & Co.—and this may be a few special friends—in opposition to the wishes and interests of the vast horde of creditors holding small demands for deposits that they made, may select some other special friend of Jay Cooke & Co. and place such assets as that firm may be willing to disclose in his hands, or they may place the estate in the hands of the firm.

If the estate is placed in the hands of some other person, the fourth section provides that the debtor shall be subject to examination, under oath, touching his property, &c., when required by the person or persons appointed to administer the estate, but not otherwise. That is to say, no creditor shall be permitted to call upon the debtor to say under oath what property he has hidden away; only the person appointed to administer can do that. But I cannot go into detail, and shall offer some considerations against the proposed repeal.

Sir, the framers of the Constitution foresaw clearly what, it seems to me, time has proved to me to be the true interest of the country, viz, that the law in relation to the settlement of bankrupts' estates should be uniform throughout the country. Accordingly, we find in the Constitution the provision authorizing Congress to "establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States."

In our commercial intercourse with each other we are in no degree restricted by State lines, and consequently the relation of debtor and creditor exists between persons living under wholly different State laws. This fact alone is sufficient reason for having a law relating to insolvent estates of uniform application throughout the nation. We must have laws on this subject whereby the property of insolvents may be applied to the benefit of creditors upon just and equitable principles, and we must have them either emanating from State legislation or from Congress. To have as many different insolvent or bankrupt laws as there are States, each of which would almost inevitably differ essentially from every other, cannot but tend to confusion, uncertainty, and serious embarrassment.

The necessity for such legislation is sufficiently attested by the fact that the Legislatures of different States have attempted to legislate on this subject, and three times in the history of this Government Congress has found it necessary to pass a bankrupt law. The fact that it has ever been necessary to enact such a law proves the importance of such an act, and of making it, as far as human wisdom can do so, perfect, and of keeping it permanently upon our statute-books.

It is hardly possible that upon the first effort Congress could enact a law of this character that would not be found to be full of defects, especially in the details of the machinery by which it is enforced. It is the work of time and experience to perfect it in its details so as to make it effective, expeditious, and inexpensive; and it requires the close scrutiny of the courts to settle and establish rules of practice necessary to its just administration. A law on such a subject, which approximates to a complete rule of right, is necessarily a growth—a growth from wisdom and experience.

Such considerations as these, and others to which I have not time now to allude, in my judgment should lead us now to the conclusion that it is the part of wisdom not to repeal the existing law, but to perfect it; not to shut our eyes to the lessons of the past, but to remedy the defects which have been plainly pointed out to us by experience—by the practical workings of the law as it is—and to retain it as a permanent remedy.

If we repeal it we may expect that in this, as in almost all other particulars, history will repeat itself, and that hereafter the time will surely come when, as in the past, Congress will be compelled again to enact such a law. Fortunate indeed will be this nation and its citizens if no such necessity shall arise. It would be folly to suppose that it will not arise. When it does come, if this law shall be repealed, then we will be compelled to have a new law, with its unavoidable defects, with the practice under it unsettled, and the attendant confusion and waste of estates in needless expense and sacrifice of property. What, sir, is the objection urged to this law? Is it against the principle of having a law of the kind? No, sir; but the objection is that the law is defective, that hardships have occurred under it. That is no argument against a bankrupt law; it is only a reason why the defects of the present law should be remedied by legislation.

Since 1867 we have had the present law. I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] that it is manifestly defective, but those defects have been brought to light and made apparent by the lessons learned in the school of experience. The courts have been shedding light upon it, and we now understand what abuses may be perpetrated under its present provisions, and may therefore proceed to remedy them. We know wherein it is unnecessarily expensive, we know wherein too much power has been granted to the courts, we know wherein its operations are too speedy or too tardy, and, sir, we are unfit for our high trusts if we cannot furnish the proper correct-ives. We have learned in what particulars it fails to preserve estates for the benefit of creditors, and can therefore supply additional safeguards.

No argument or illustration drawn from the unfavorable operations of the present law is of a feather's weight against the principle of having a uniform system of bankruptcy. As I said before, it is only an argument against the defects of the existing law, and instead of being a reason for its repeal, it should be the strongest appeal to us to proceed without delay to remedy those defects.

Believing that a uniform rule of action on this subject, applicable alike to every part of the country, and to every person, whether residing in one State or another, is infinitely preferable and more conducive to justice than to have thirty-seven different rules of action enacted by as many different Legislatures, each of which would, in all human probability, essentially differ from the other, thereby producing embarrassment and confusion, and often giving creditors living in the vicinity of the debtor advantages over those living remote, I believe it to be unwise to repeal the existing law and wise to perfect it.

For these, among other reasons, I cannot give my assent to its repeal, and trust that the House will recommit the bill to the committee for further action.

Mr. ELDREDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. BECK rose.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] desires to have read for information an amendment which he proposes to offer. I yield that it may be read.

Mr. BECK. I will offer at the proper time, if I should get an opportunity, the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That all suits and proceedings now pending in the courts of the United States, wherein an adjudication for bankruptcy has been made, shall be proceeded with and governed by the provisions of existing laws, which are hereby continued in force only for the purpose of closing up suits now pending: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act the fees, commissions, and charges of the officers and agents of the courts in bankrupt cases shall be reduced to one-half of the fees, commissions, and charges heretofore allowed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] will yield the floor to allow that amendment to be offered.

Mr. ELDREDGE. In the present position of the question it can only be read for information.

Mr. HOLMAN. The House certainly should have an opportunity to vote on that proposition.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I suppose that in the present condition of the bill it cannot be pending as an amendment.

The SPEAKER. It cannot, because a motion to recommit is pending.

Mr. BECK. I shall endeavor to offer it if an opportunity occurs.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] has told the House that this bill is brought in here "in hot haste," and he has suggested to the House that it comes here at the instance of the attorney of the banking-house of Jay Cooke & Co. Whether this is so or not I do not know, nor do I care; but I think it is a fact new to this House. It certainly was not suggested in the committee that it was moved by any banking-house. So far as I am concerned, I say I do not care from what source it comes or at whose instance the bill to repeal was introduced. I have opposed this bankrupt law from the beginning. I have opposed it upon principle, believing that it was radically wrong and ought never to have been enacted. I have steadily voted against amendments to it, because I was opposed to any bankrupt law. My opposition has not arisen in hot haste. My opposition has been deliberate and persistent from the time the measure was first brought to the House. It is said, it is admitted, that the law is full of defects, but that if care is taken it can be amended and made what it ought to be.

The fact is well known to the House that if a bankrupt law could be prepared with care and deliberation, the existing law was so prepared. It was prepared and brought into this House and managed by a gentleman who, it is said, (I do not know how true the statement is,) was the first to avail himself of its provisions. If so, he was competent; and, preparing it for himself, that he might avail himself of its provisions and be discharged of his debts, would naturally have prepared it as well as it could be. But no bankrupt law could be made to satisfy me, and I doubt if any one could be made with less defects than the present one that would not be of greater injury than benefit to the people of the country.

Now, I should like to hear from any man on this floor, from any man in the country, a single benefit to the country that has ever come of this bankrupt law. What good has it done? Whose interests has it protected? What property has it distributed? What debts has it paid? I have had some experience in inquiring into its operation while investigating the conduct of some of the district judges of the United States, and, so far as I have been able to learn, it has operated practically as a confiscation of debtors' estates, not for the benefit of creditors, not to settle or pay debts. It has simply confiscated the debtor's property to put fees into the hands of the officers of the courts, and in some instances, I have been led to believe, into the hands of the judges themselves. The fees have been excessive to such an extent as to exhaust the debtor's property without any or but little benefit to the creditors.

The effect of the law upon the country has been, in my judgment, wholly bad. I do not believe that it has encouraged honesty in the debtor, nor has it been any advantage to the creditor. In most instances into which I have inquired the entire assets of the debtor have been consumed in the payment of fees and in the settlement of the estate. This law was never a favorite measure with the people of the rural—the farming—districts. Among the thousands upon thousands of bankrupt cases, I do not suppose there have been twenty in the entire United States where a farmer, an agriculturist, a man living in the rural districts, has availed himself of the machinery of this law to wipe out his debts or to avoid their payment. It was a scheme devised in the interest of speculators; and its effect has been to encourage undue speculation and recklessness in the transaction of business. The farmers, the agriculturists, never were in favor of this law. There has never been an hour since its enactment when the great mass of the people of the country have not desired its repeal. It has been understood and is well known by the people. They have well considered it.

There is no "hot haste" for the repeal of this law. There has not been a session of Congress since its enactment when some one upon the floor of this House or in the Senate has not introduced a bill for its repeal. At the last session this House, by a two-thirds vote, under a suspension of the rules, passed a bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law. There were then no lawyers of any banking-house here advocating that measure or desiring its passage. Those institutions were then carrying on their—it may be reckless—speculation, in view perhaps of the final opportunity of being discharged of their liabilities under this infernal law.

Gentlemen tell us about "hot haste" in regard to the repeal of this law. But, sir, the people have had ample opportunity to judge of its effects. They have seen the ruin that it has brought upon thousands of honest creditors in this country; and they have demanded its repeal. The repeal is not demanded by lawyers; it is demanded by the business men, the people. I have no doubt that to-day in the city of New York and elsewhere there are men in embarrassed circumstances who, but for the provisions of this law, might with the help of friends get through their difficulties successfully and survive the panic. But if a friend were willing to step in and advance money to aid a debtor he dare not do it, because he knows not but that the very next day the debtor may be forced into bankruptcy and he lose his advances.

The law prevents the negotiation of a settlement. It prevents all voluntary co-operation among creditors in regard to the property of the debtor or helping him from his embarrassments. It in fact interrupts all those relations in life whereby a creditor may, if he pleases, aid an honest debtor. It would be more properly denominated a confiscation law than a law for the distribution of the assets of the debtor among his creditors.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, in regard to the order of the discussion, that the members of the Judiciary Committee, which committee has reported the bill, are first entitled to recognition.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire, nor could I now argue this question of the repeal of the bankrupt act thoroughly or to my own satisfaction. I simply wish to make a few suggestions which commend themselves to me, and I hope may to the sober, sound sense of this Congress. I pray the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] to remember that during the last session of the last Congress the bankrupt act was repealed by a two-thirds vote with not a single word of debate in this House—a law affecting the whole country, a law under which, the moment we repealed it, there were more than ten thousand cases pending in all the stages of progress in the courts of the United States; and yet that repeal passed here by a two-thirds vote in this House without any saving clause whatever for those ten thousand cases. Ah! there was hot haste for the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] and hot haste for the House of Representatives, which, when they reflect upon it, I trust will lead the members to give a matter of this importance full, careful, and candid consideration.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] says that three times there has been a great bankrupt act enacted in the United States; three times made necessary by great national misfortunes. I differ, sir, from the gentleman from New York, but not as to the facts he states. The three great whirlwinds which swept over this country and cast wrecks broadcast were not the necessity for a bankrupt law. They simply illustrated the existing necessity, and nothing more. Thousands of men are dying every moment of time, and there is not a single ripple; but when the great Agassiz dies, then the great heart of the whole world beats in sorrow and sympathy. This whirlwind, then, illustrates the existing necessity, and nothing more. There is a gale blowing always in commercial life, and beneath that gale there are wrecks every day and every hour unnoticed by the world. They are not the wrecks of the great, like those in this last hurricane which swept over the land, but of the middle class. They are going down hourly and daily, and the necessity of something which shall relieve those men from their grasping creditors was, I say, illustrated by the whirlwind and nothing more. That necessity was met by this bankrupt act when it gave an equal distribution of all of a debtor's property to his creditors and discharged him from liability.

I know, sir, in the majority of cases creditors will release an honest debtor; but there is a liability of some Shylock standing up in the case of every insolvent debtor who shall say to him, "I demand my bond;" and there is no good judge to stand between him and the letter of the bond. There was a necessity on the part of this debtor class all over the land to relieve them from grasping, wicked creditors. This law stepped in and gave that aid to the debtor class which it desired for so many years. It is an absolute necessity to honest commercial transactions to-day. The voluntary part is to the greatest extent for the creditor. To be sure, it gives to the creditor his equal share of the debtor's estate, but it releases the debtor, and discharges him from all indebtedness whatsoever, after it is amended as it ought to be by striking out the requirement for the payment of 50 per cent. When an honest man, engulfed, fails, and turns over all his property, whether one dollar or five hundred thousand dollars, that honest man is entitled to his discharge. Therefore, amend your law in that respect; and that is all the amendment which the voluntary clause, in my judgment, requires.

But, sir, the honest debtor has not been remembered alone; unfortunately in this country of ours there are dishonest debtors. There is not an hour when some fraudulent conveyance is not being made by the debtor to secure his property from his honest creditors. How many dishonest cases there are where husbands convey their property to their wives in order that it may escape their creditors.

Now look at this bankrupt act where it is made involuntary, where it is made in the interest of the creditors. I ask you to go to our State laws and point out a single statute which takes the place of that bankrupt law. There is provision for the examination of the bankrupt which is peremptory. He is to be placed before the register, and put under examination as to all of his property and as to his disposition of it.

Show me a statute in one of our States where we do not practice under a code as you do in New York and Ohio; show me a statute which gives you that authority and that power over a dishonest debtor. Take that provision which allows the wife who has received a fraudulent conveyance to be cited before the bankrupt court and examined in relation to that; show me the statute of a State which supplies the place of that. And so I might go on illustrating again and again defects in existing State laws for the collection of debts from dishonest debtors which are supplied by the existing bankrupt law.

Now, sir, repeal that law and where are you? Why, sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts said that in Massachusetts they cared nothing about it; they had a bankrupt law there of which this was a copy and the moment this was repealed theirs was revived. It is well for the old Commonwealth that she has the sense and the justice and the mercy to provide a bankrupt law. But, sir, there are thousands of cases in which our law cannot relieve our citizens. By the lex loci governing in the matter of contracts when the debtor has gone through bankruptcy his property has not under their law been distributed equally among all his creditors; but when he has gone through bankruptcy and has been discharged there are creditors still existing who hold their claims against him. Congress alone having power over the whole country can enact a uniform bankrupt law which shall meet the necessities of the country.

Mr. TREMAIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. TREMAIN. I understand that the Massachusetts law requires 50 per cent. assets; and I understand that the gentleman from Maine is opposed to that provision.

Mr. FRYE. In answer to the gentleman I will say that I did not know that there was that requirement in the law. And I say it is an unjust requirement, whether it be in the Massachusetts law or any other. I say that an honest debtor giving up all his estate under the law is entitled to his discharge, and no other law is satisfactory to me.

Now, repeal the law and what will be the result? I will illustrate it by my own State. We have a law in Maine and they have a similar law all over New England, I think, by which you may issue a writ or attachment at once. A lawyer may issue a writ, put his officer into a merchant's store and attach every dollar of property he has in the world under the writ; and prior to the passage of the bankrupt act one-half of the cases on the docket in our courts in Maine were merely suits for the collection of debts.

This bankruptcy act came in; and you will not find on our dockets to-day one single suit for the collection of debt. Why not? Why, because when a merchant is in difficulty in my city and the merchant in Boston or New York desires to collect his debt, he comes down to my city, looks the merchant's stock over, sees that it cannot be conveyed away fraudulently from the creditors, on account of the bankruptcy law, and knows that it cannot be attached because the attachment would be dissolved. He looks it over, sees what that merchant can pay, says to the merchant "pay to your creditors so much on the dollar and you shall be relieved;" and it is done at once.

Now, the provisions in the bankrupt law effect that. Repeal it and where then will we lawyers be? It will increase my business alone in my own city more than five hundred thousand dollars a year. Why? Because the vigilant creditor in New York or Boston sends down to the attorney in the city of Lewiston the inquiry "is not such a merchant in a little difficulty; are you certain about his standing?" The answer is, "I am not certain." He directs me to issue a writ of attachment. I issue a writ of attachment, send an officer in, and take possession of his stock of goods. Then the news goes at once to Boston and New York, and in less than one day fifty attachments will be put on that man's stock. Now, what is the result?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I wish to ask my colleague one question, as I will have no opportunity of taking part in the debate. Does not the gentleman believe that the sentiment in the State of Maine, not of professional men, but of business men, is as ninety-nine to one in favor of the repeal of the bankrupt law?

Mr. FRYE. I do not.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do.

Mr. FRYE. If I believed that ninety-nine to one of my constituents were opposed to the views I entertained, I should not be likely to ventilate them a great deal.

I believe that the bankrupt law is a necessity, if the gentleman will allow me to go on. Fifty attachments are made and $500 costs are made. Twenty-eight of the attaching creditors, the stock being sold by the sheriff, get their pay in full; the lawyers get their pay in full; the other twenty-five creditors never get a single dollar, and the debtor gets no release whatever.

Now, that is the result in Maine, and I believe it is the result in every New England State. It is the result everywhere where an attachment can be made on the stock in trade. Sir, I hope the statute will not be repealed. It ought to be amended. We have had it in operation for years, with all of its machinery at work; we have seen all its weakness and know where it needs amendment. Let us take it and amend it and put it into working shape; let us recommit this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] has moved for that purpose, and, mark my words, if this House does repeal it, it will not make commercial men more honest, it will not make business men more careful; it will open the flood-gates for fraud.

Mr. JEWETT. Mr. Speaker, the people I represent, having an interest in the question under consideration, I desire to make known to the House, not by way of argument, but simply by way of a statement, the consideration which induced me to concur in the report of the committee and to favor the passage of this bill.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, it is conceded by all, that the operation of the bankrupt law is unfavorable to the general business interests of the country; that it does no one good; that it inflicts evil wherever it has been in force. That is the universal conviction of those with whom I, in any capacity, have been brought in contact. Permit me a word now, Mr. Speaker with regard to a few statements which have been made in opposition to the bill. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] speaks of it as being brought in with great haste. How with great haste? The House in the last Congress passed a bill repealing the bankrupt law. The fact that that bill had passed the House went abroad and was known to the people throughout the entire country. Have there been any petitions against the repeal? Have there been any manifestations of opposition by the people to that act on the part of this House? No, sir; on the contrary, so far as the members of the last Congress are concerned, and, I believe, universally so far as regards the new members, they have come here with the impression made upon them by their own people that the repeal of that act was a judicious measure and ought to be renewed.

It is said that this bill is reported especially with a view to meet the case of Jay Cooke & Co. Now, as a member of the committee, in the consideration of this bill, I did not hear Jay Cooke & Co. or any other firm referred to until this discussion took place on this floor. The principle of the bill is right. It is not a new principle. In all other associated organizations, in all business arrangements, in all other departments, what is the rule? Is it that they shall be controlled by a majority of members? No such thing; it is that they are controlled by a majority of interest. That is the general rule, and whenever it is departed from it is an exception. Why depart from it in this case? I ask, why in the disposition of the property of a bankrupt, of a man embarrassed, the minority in interest should direct the disposition of the property? Why change the general rule? Why change a rule which is almost universal in every department of trade or business, that a majority in interest shall control and direct the proceedings to be had? There is no reason for it. Without having in view the case of Jay Cooke & Co., or any other party, I believe that it is unbecoming the House to legislate for or against Jay Cooke & Co., or any other firm; but that certain general, fixed, approved principles should be kept in view in all we do. I regard that as a safe and sound principle in relation to this bill and all others. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] says that in his State they get their remedy by attachment. That means simply that they are a little behind the age in not having other remedies than attachment and provisions of law by which the property of the debtor may be protected and held for the benefit of all the creditors, instead of being absorbed or destroyed by a mere attachment creditor. Mr. Speaker, what is the result of the bankrupt act, its practical result throughout the country, as we observe it day by day? I have in my mind's eye now a gentleman of large wealth in my own State, of great enterprise, largely engaged in business, wielding his property, his energy, his skill, and his talents, for the benefit of the community in which he lives; a man not only of known wealth, but a man whose integrity has borne him up in all and every condition, and under all circumstances. What is his condition to-day? A few days before I left the State, in an interview with that gentleman on matters of business, he remarked to me that any one of his forty creditors could consign him to bankruptcy; and yet every one knew that his property was fourfold the amount of all his obligations. Why was this? Simply because he was engaged in large enterprises, was a man of great energy, had lent his name and his credit to the young men around him that they might grow up useful and serviceable members of society, and because the banks and men of capital upon whom he relied to serve him in case of emergency were, in consequence of the condition of things in the country, unable to give him the aid they were in the habit of extending. His paper came back to him under protest. The men to whom he had extended credits had failed him, and consequently he was unable to meet his obligations; and although his property was far beyond the extent of his liabilities, yet that very day a creditor having no great interest in the community could have brought him to the door of the bankrupt court, laid him prostrate at his feet, and destroyed all the interests that that man had through life been seeking to build up. This is but one case. They are numerous. Such is the evidence we have of the operation of this law. I believe as a business man that the existence of this bankrupt act is doing more to-day to continue the present condition of things in the country than all the stringency in the money market. It is the uncertainty, the doubt, the fear that at an unexpected moment some unyielding creditor will place in bankruptcy the struggling debtor, that the means that he has will be taken beyond his control and be absorbed by the proceedings of the court. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that no good is to result from this law, and I am unqualifiedly in favor of its repeal.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio one question. I would like to inquire if the object of this bill is simply to repeal the act of 1867 and the various amendments, why did not the bill say so? Why the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth sections, which propose new legislation? Why not in the ordinary way repeal the bill? Why insert the fifth section, unless some special case was in view before the committee?

Mr. JEWETT. For myself I would prefer the bill without those sections, because I think they may embarrass its passage; but the object of those sections is to place the property of the debtor in the hands of the majority in interest of the creditors, and it is for that reason that I favor it.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I wish to ask this question, whether the provisions of sections 3 and 4 of this bill do not submit the rights of the creditors in the minority to the control of a majority of the creditors in value, even if such majority consist of but one man, without judicial decision or control; whether they do not keep the case in bankruptcy so as to cut off creditors from the ordinary legal remedy and take him out of the jurisdiction of the courts, merely directing the court to register the determination of the majority of the creditors of value; and whether this is a constitutional and uniform system of bankruptcy?

Mr. JEWETT. It is simply, as I understand it, a change in the provisions of law as they now exist so as to give the majority in interest the control instead of the majority in numbers.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It cuts off the court entirely?

Mr. JEWETT. Under the present law the court is cut off from interfering in case an agreement is made by the majority in numbers. The change is that the agreement being made by the majority in value, shall become the law of the case instead of an agreement by the majority in numbers.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Does the gentleman say that this bill does not extend what the majority may do entirely beyond what the provisions of the existing law does?

Mr. JEWETT. It may do it; I am not prepared to say. I have assigned simply the considerations that lead me to favor this bill. I do not desire nor intend to detain the House by discussing it at large.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to ask a question which influenced me in the amendment I proposed. Suppose my son becomes a bankrupt, and he owes me more than he does all his other creditors; can I not under the provisions of this bill take the case out of the court, put him in possession of all his property, and allow him to control it against the will of all the other creditors, and keep him from being examined? And ought that to be?

Mr. JEWETT. Upon the same principle precisely that under the present law, if the gentleman had five sons, and he owed each of them $5, and there was a sixth creditor to whom he owed $10,000, the five in number would control the other creditor of a hundred times the amount. The principle is entirely the same.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, if the question before the House was the simple repeal of this bankrupt law, and there was no other alternative submitted to us except the repeal or continuance of the law as it is, I should unquestionably be in favor of the repeal of the law. But it occurs to me, upon an examination of this subject, and looking to the condition of the country and the state of mind as exhibited in this House—and I believe I do no injustice to any one in saying that the opinion in this Congress is the same that now prevails in this country in reference to this law—after a fair and just and deliberate consideration of this subject, and of the arguments that have been adduced, the reasons which are urged, the causes of the sentiment which prevail in favor of the repeal of this law, result rather from defects in the law and abuses in the administration of that law, than from the propriety or impropriety of the law itself.

It is not possible, in the brief time allotted to me, to enter into a general discussion of the merits of the existing bankrupt law. But I wish to call the attention of the House to what I conceive to be, or what are regarded and stated to be, the defects of the law, and to the obvious amendments by which those defects can be provided against. I think that the experience of this country, and the character of our people and the character of their pursuits, prompt the consideration, if not the conviction, that a bankrupt law is proper and necessary in this country.

This bankrupt law, though defective, is like other bankrupt laws which were also defective. It was stated by the gentleman on my right [Mr. ELDREDGE] that great deliberation and care had been exercised upon the preparation of this bill. I suggest that this must be a mistake. As I understand it, this is almost a copy of the English bankrupt law. It is not a law suited to our people and to our condition.

I propose briefly to suggest the defects in the law and the remedies for them as they have presented themselves to my mind. Under the original bankrupt law a failure to pay commercial paper for fourteen days was an act of bankruptcy, provided that failure was the result of fraud; or, in other words, if there was a fraudulent failure to pay commercial paper for fourteen days, that was an act of bankruptcy. By the amendment of April 14, 1870, the mere failure to pay was an act of bankruptcy. Now, I suggest that this joint amendment of this law should be the restoration of the original clause, so as to make this fraudulent failure to pay, or the fraudulent conveyance of property, an act of bankruptcy, and to provide that the petitioning creditor who charges this fraudulent want of payment or fraudulent conveyance shall not only make an oath to the facts which constitute the fraud, but that he shall give bond and security to answer in damages for any wrong or malicious suing out of the petition.

Let me repeat this, because I believe it to be at the very foundation of what I consider the most important amendment of this law as it now stands, and one that will provide against many of the evils which are now complained of, and which are pressing and will press hard upon the minds of gentlemen here. If, then, the law be amended so as to require a fraudulent failure to pay, or a fraudulent transfer of property, to constitute an act of bankruptcy, and then providing that the party suing out the proceeding in bankruptcy or the petitioning creditor shall give bond and security to indemnify the bankrupt for a wrongful or malicious suing out of that proceeding, it will obviate capricious or malicious proceedings under this law and subserve the legitimate end of a bankrupt law—the prevention of fraud and a fair and equal distribution of the property of the bankrupt among all his creditors. And I would go further; I would require that one-third of all the creditors of the bankrupt should enter into the proceedings, or else that the proceeding itself should be dismissed.

The next amendment of this law that I would suggest to the House is, that a majority in numbers and value of the creditors of any bankrupt, after the party has been adjudicated a bankrupt, may take the administration of the estate into their hands, and may compromise with him, may make any arrangement which they may deem proper with the bankrupt, and have their agreement made an order of the court and adjudicated as in other cases, or let the final adjudication of the court conform to their action and be of the same force and validity as the usual decrees of the bankrupt court.

Now, I propose to meet an objection which has been suggested to this mode of procedure. It is said that it is new. Sir, it is not new. This proposed amendment is also borrowed from the English law. It is not a suggestion of expediency of that nation which stands at the head of the commercial world.

Another amendment of this law which I would propose is that the fees allowed the officers of courts shall be reduced one-half. I am willing to take the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] My proposition is that they shall be reduced; and the extent of reduction shall be left for further and more mature consideration.

Then there is another amendment which I think even still more important; and that is that the judge of the bankrupt court shall not be permitted in any case to allow other fees than those which are prescribed by the act itself. I submit to gentlemen who complain so much of this bankrupt law whether the most fruitful source of complaint against it has not been the evil to which this amendment is directed. Why have the estates of bankrupts been oftener than otherwise absorbed and not made available for the benefit of creditors? Because, in the first place, of the large fees which have been granted to the officers of the courts, and the unlimited discretion which has been given to the judge to allow whatever additional fees and compensation he may think proper.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, obtained the floor.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to proceed a few moments longer.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I am willing to yield to the gentlemen five minutes.

Mr. WHITE. I only wish to bring to the attention of the House the various amendments which have occurred to me as proper, the adoption of which I think would adapt the bankrupt law to the emergencies which so often occur in our country, and to meet, what seems to be a matter of the highest consideration in this House, the approbation of the people.

The next amendment which I would propose is, that all conveyances made in good faith previous to an act of bankruptcy shall be held as valid. By another amendment I would allow an appeal from the decisions of the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States. One of the great evils connected with the operation of the present law is the contrariety of decisions—the fact that in one circuit we have one line of decisions, and in another circuit another. The injurious effects which have been experienced in this respect could be obviated by allowing an appeal from the decision of the circuit judges to the Supreme Court of the United States, thus securing uniformity of decision in reference to this law.

This bankrupt law has two features—the voluntary and the involuntary feature; and one of these, the voluntary feature, seems to have escaped observation entirely. Against this no argument has been directed. It is the involuntary feature alone which is the subject of complaint; it is obvious that this is the cause of the excitement here and elsewhere. I have pointed out how the defects in the involuntary feature of the law may be remedied. Certainly there is no reason for repealing the voluntary feature because of objections to the involuntary feature, objections which we insist can be obviated by amendments.

But I wish to call attention for a moment to an incongruity in the proposed act of repeal. It provides that as to the cases now pending, whether there has been an adjudication in bankruptcy or not, the law is not to take effect, but such cases shall go through the mill—this crushing mill, as gentlemen describe it—of the bankrupt court. Why, sir, if evils exist, why not put a stop to them as soon as we may? Why let the existing law continue to operate as to all cases already pending? Why let it inflict its injuries upon all now within reach of its operation, instead of stopping short its injurious operation wherever the rights of third parties have not intervened? Why draw this unjust line of demarkation as to where the repealing act shall take effect, or where the saving clause shall operate? A petition in bankruptcy, or even an adjudication in bankruptcy, vests no rights; it does not interfere in any sense or degree with the relative rights of the bankrupt and his creditors until there has been some action of the court ordering the sale of property, or something equivalent to it, by which the rights of third persons intervene and become affected.

Now, I insist that if we repeal this law the repeal should take effect in every case pending in the courts, whether there has been an adjudication of bankruptcy or not, unless the adjudication has gone so far that the rights of third persons have intervened, in which case the existing law should continue to operate for the protection of the rights of those third persons. But if evils exist under the operation of the present law, let us cut them short at the nearest possible point. If we propose to relieve injuries which have been experienced, let us give relief in all possible cases, unless in giving that relief we do injury to the rights of others.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I give way to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] who wishes to offer an amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I shall, when the proper time arrives, take the sense of the House upon the following amendment to the motion to recommit:

Add to the motion to recommit instructions to report such amendments to the bankrupt law as shall increase the authority of the judge in bankruptcy to suspend proceedings, when, upon a full and just exhibit by the debtor of the assets and condition of his estate, and a showing on behalf of his creditors, it shall appear that the debtor's assets may within a reasonable time be made sufficient to discharge all his liabilities, and to make such other and further orders in the case as shall prevent all unnecessary proceedings in bankruptcy; and also to report such amendments as shall diminish the cost and incidental expenses of proceedings in bankruptcy.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it is said that the first man to avail himself of the benefits of the existing bankrupt law was a gentleman who was exceedingly active in preparing it and pressing it through this House. I do not know whether the statement is true; but if so it may be said as truly of some of us who are engaged in pressing through the repeal that we may be the last to escape its benefits. But whether that is so or not it does not weigh particularly for or against the passage of this bill. The existing law ought to stand, as all other legislation should stand, upon its merits. If it is a measure calculated to conduce to the good of the citizen, if it tends on the whole to make the community better and more honest, it ought to stand; if it be not such a law, it should be abolished.

I am one of those who believe from the testimony that has come before me, and from my own observation and experience, that this law has ceased to be useful, if it ever was so, and that it ought now at least to be wiped out.

Unfortunately, perhaps, in that State I live in a portion which differs somewhat from that in which my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] lives. It seems, however, according to his argument, he is in favor of it chiefly because it is never executed there where he lives. It has been attempted to be executed so much with us, or in the region where I dwell, that I believe the people are of one mind in demanding its repeal; and I have been led to think, from conversations I have heard here, that that opinion is spreading and has become almost unanimous in favor of its repeal. But, sir, that does not give me any hope in reference to its passage, for I have seen a bill now pending, which we are all in favor of, in reference to which there seems to be, however, a good deal of difficulty in passing it, and that is an illustration of how difficult it is in this House to accomplish that which seems to be desired by all the members. Of course I need not say that I refer to the bill repealing the salaries. [Laughter.]

I demand its repeal and satisfy myself with the provisions of the law asked to be enacted for the purpose of taking care of all interests already pending in the bankrupt courts. My own idea was that the law should be repealed, leaving only power in the courts to continue to grind out the grist already in the bankrupt courts in the way exactly pointed out by the old law. That is the kind of repeal I desire. But I am unwilling to risk my vote in favor of a number of sections like those we have here. It is always a difficult matter to settle and adjudicate a new law.

I now call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] and others interested in the passage of this law to some of its peculiar provisions, and hope and expect in some way, after the discussion of the bill has been gone through with, it will be placed in such a position that it may be made to meet what I think to be the wishes of the majority of the members upon this floor. The second section provides—and I desire the attention of the House to it for one moment, because it is worded in such a way that I am not willing to risk my vote in its favor—it is provided in the second section that it shall be lawful for the majority in value of the creditors to determine the plan by which the estate of the bankrupt shall be managed, administered, controlled, disposed of, wound up, and distributed; and also to adopt such agreement or plan for settlement, compromise, extension, composition of the claims against the estate and the bankrupt, or for the division of the assets or any portion thereof, among the creditors, in money or property, real or personal, as they may deem expedient.

That is a provision which I do not fully comprehend. It seems to me to be one which ought not to be embraced in the bill. It permits the majority of the creditors to determine the debts of the debtor that the bankrupt petitioner shall be paid in property. Now, while the majority under certain circumstances may control various proceedings relating to the bankrupt, yet to the minority has been reserved the right, which I think ought to be reserved, to reduce the assets of the debtor to cash, and to require that the payment of creditors shall be in cash.

The proviso, therefore, which declares that the assets of the debtor may be paid by distribution of property is to my mind something unjust; and I hope some proposition such as has been shadowed forth in the substitute sent up to be read by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] may take the place of this language in the second section of the bill.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, the only legislation needed is the enactment of section 1 and an addition to section 7, by which it shall be provided that in all the cases now pending the entire proceedings shall be gone through with. I believe that is the correct way in which to do this thing.

I might, Mr. Speaker, say a word in reference to the importance of this law; I might to some extent discuss it; I have had some opportunity to witness its workings; I know to some extent the effect it has had upon the business interests of the country; but I see that my time has nearly expired, and I only wish to say, in conclusion, that, in reference to the involuntary bankruptcy, it is a question which I am very willing to consider on its own merits hereafter.

Mr. EAMES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct an impression of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD,] which he appears to entertain from the statement made by him, that a distinguished citizen of my State, who was active in procuring the passage of the bankrupt law, was the first to avail himself of its provisions. That is not so; nor, indeed, so far as I know, did he ever at any time apply for the benefit of the provisions of that act.

Mr. POLAND obtained the floor.

Mr. SENER. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to yield to me to have an amendment, which I desire to offer, read for the information of the House.

Mr. POLAND. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. SENER. If I get the floor I propose to submit the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary to repeal the bankrupt law be recommitted to the committee with instructions to report—

First. A bill suspending, for a definite period, the operation of so much of the thirty-ninth section of the bankrupt law as provides for declaring an involuntary bankrupt any banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner who has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days; and

Second. So much of the thirty-third section of said law as provides that in all proceedings in bankruptcy commenced after the 1st day of January, 1869, no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets shall not be equal to 50 per cent. of the claims proved against his estate upon which he shall be liable as the principal debtor, unless the assent in writing of a majority in number and value of his creditors to whom he shall have become liable as a principal debtor, and who shall have proved their claims, be filed in the case, at or before the time of the hearing of the application for discharge; and

Third. Amending and modifying the several sections of said law referring to fees of registers, assignees, and the officers of court, so as to define more accurately, and if necessary to reduce the amount of the fees to which they may be severally entitled, and which are chargeable upon and payable out of the assets of the bankrupt, together with any such amendments as in their judgment will tend to secure uniformity and efficiency in the administration of said bankrupt law.

Mr. McCRARY. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] yields to me to have read a substitute which I propose to offer when it is in order for me to do so.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. All proceedings in bankruptcy commenced under any of the acts hereby repealed prior to the taking effect of this act, shall be carried on, adjudicated, and determined in the same manner as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. DUELL. The gentleman from Vermont yields to me to have an amendment read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to strike out sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, and retain sections 1 and 7, making the seventh section the second section; and that the committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the motion to recommit by adding: "With instructions to so amend the bill as to prohibit preference of creditors hereafter by failing debtors, and to give the State courts jurisdiction to enforce the provisions of the same."

Mr. POLAND. In the very few minutes that are allowed me to speak upon this question I of course shall have little time to go over the arguments in favor of a bankrupt law. The real question, Mr. Speaker, before the House is this, whether we shall have a bankrupt law at all or not. The several members of the Judiciary Committee all agreed that many defects had been discovered in the present law which needed amendment. I entirely dissent from what was said by the gentleman from New York, that the committee disagreed in relation to wherein the law needed amendment, and that it would be a useless work for the members of the Judiciary Committee to undertake to setttle among themselves what amendments the law needed. So far as we had any discussion whatever in relation to the defects in the existing law and in relation to the particulars wherein it needed amendments, we entirely concurred.

And I do not despair at all, if this bill be recommitted to the Judiciary Committee, of our being able to agree upon amendments that would be satisfactory to us, satisfactory to this House, and satisfactory, I believe, to the whole people of the country.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the question substantially is this, whether if we can have as perfect a bankrupt law as can be made, whether we shall have it or whether we shall have none. That is the question that is substantially presented to the House for its decision this morning.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am as dispassionate upon this subject as any man can be upon this floor. Perhaps the people of no State in this Union have less interest in this question, whether there shall be a bankrupt law or not, than the people of the State of Vermont, a part of whom I represent upon this floor. We are almost entirely an agricultural people. We are very little commercial. We are as free from the casualties and misfortunes and mishaps of trade as any people can be. Therefore, so far as my immediate constituents are concerned, it is a matter of very little account to them, a matter in which they take very little interest, whether there shall be a national law for the relief of insolvent debtors or a national law for the collection of debts. I speak in a broader sense. My views upon this subject are founded upon a broader basis than the interests of my own immediate constituents.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is not a commercial country in the world that has not a bankrupt law. Most commercial countries have had bankrupt laws for hundreds of years, and it seems to me that in a country so largely commercial as ours it is indispensable that we have a national law upon the subject of debtor and creditor. And, Mr. Speaker, this is the more necessary on account of our subdivision into States. Each State has its own peculiar local polity, its own peculiar laws for the collection of debts, and for the establishment and enforcement of all the relations between debtor and creditor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, some of the States of the Union have a law by which insolvent debtors can be discharged; but I believe a majority of the States have not. Of the six New England States I believe Massachusetts is the only one that has or ever had an insolvent law. In all the other States of New England a law prevails that was described by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE]—the attachment upon mesne or original process. All that the creditor has to do, if he has a debt against a debtor, is to take out his writ; and if he can find property of the debtor, seize it upon his writ, and he has priority over every other creditor; and for this reason the people in my State, or many of them, have been opposed to a bankrupt law. They said, "If any of our people get into debt, why, if there is any difficulty about their circumstances, we know it before people in other States know it. We want to avail ourselves of our laws, and, being the first to seize their property and get payment of our own debts, to let foreign creditors run their own chances." Now, if commerce was just as restricted—if trade was as restricted as State lines, why then there would be comparatively little necessity for a national law to establish and settle the relations between debtor and creditor; but we all know that commerce pays no attention to State lines; it goes abroad everywhere over the whole land. Why, Mr. Speaker, up in the little town among the mountains of Vermont where I live we have a firm that deals with every State in the Union, and, I presume, with every county in every State. Therefore, inasmuch as commerce itself is so universal, why we ought to have a commercial law that is equally universal—that furnishes the same rule and the same remedy everywhere throughout the whole realm.

The embarrassment about State insolvent laws is that they are partial, and must be so, in their operation. The insolvent courts are the creatures of the local State laws; and a discharge under the insolvency laws of Massachusetts is no discharge to the debtor as respects a creditor outside of Massachusetts, unless he chooses to come in as a party to the proceedings. Now, it is perfectly settled by repeated judicial decisions of the country that a discharge under a State insolvent law only discharges the debtor from debts that are within the jurisdiction that passed the law. Therefore, so far as the voluntary part of the bankrupt law is concerned, it is absolutely necessary, in order to make it effectual and perfect and wholly release the insolvent debtor who surrenders all, that the law should be national in its operation. As I said, I agree with all the other gentlemen who have spoken, and with every member of the Judiciary Committee, that the present law is defective and needs amendment in many particulars.

The involuntary part of it—that portion of it that is intended as a remedy for creditors against their debtors, either fraudulent or insolvent—needs amendment. I agree that the incorporation into the law a few years ago of the provision that the non-payment of his notes by a commercial man or trader for fourteen days is an absolute act of bankruptcy may be harsh in its operation. I believe there may be cases where a man, by some misfortune, may be compelled to allow his notes to run over more than fourteen days when he is actually solvent and has the means to pay all his debts. I would agree to an amendment of the law which would confine that provision to cases of fraudulent acts on the part of the debtor and fraudulent attempts to evade his debts, and to cases of real and actual insolvency of the commercial debtor, and let the non-payment and dishonor of his commercial paper go to the court merely as a piece of evidence tending to show whether the man is solvent or insolvent. There will be no difficulty in amending the law in that particular. In such cases, will any one pretend that the creditors ought not to be allowed to step in and have the property of the fraudulent or the insolvent debtor taken by the law and disposed of for the purpose of making equal distribution among them?

But, in my belief, this objection is more fanciful than real. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] has dwelt eloquently upon the hardship of it; but did he tell us of any case? Can he tell us of any case where this evil has been done? I know from the newspapers that a great banking firm in New York city, for the purpose of getting time and avoiding the sacrifice of their securities in the late panic, procured proceedings in bankruptcy to be instituted against themselves, and got themselves enjoined from paying any debts or negotiating any securities. This is the only case I have ever heard of where a really solvent man or solvent firm has been put into bankruptcy under this provision of the law. I have heard of some other great concerns that attribute their embarrassments to the existence of this provision of the bankrupt law, but I greatly fear they give this reason because they have no better one to give.

Another objection made by the gentleman from New York to the bankrupt law was the conflict of decision by judges of courts in different States. Doubtless there has been some conflict of opinion and of decision under this law, as there always is upon a new law with a great variety of provisions. But if inconvenience and difficulty have been found from the mere differences of construction of the same law by the different judges, how immensely more and greater must be the difficulty when the whole law and practice and principle in relation to debtor and creditor is diverse in the different States.

It is said, too, by the same gentleman that conveyances and transfers of property, made upon good conditions and in good faith, with no knowledge or suspicions of insolvency, are held invalid. It is sufficient to say that such is not the bankrupt law; all such conveyances and transfers are held good by the bankrupt law if made in good faith and without notice of insolvency. If any judge or court has held differently he has decided differently from what the law is.

There have no dividends ever been paid in a single case in New York, says the same gentleman. I do not mean to question the gentleman's veracity; but it is apparent that this is a wholesale statement that comes from street rumor or less authentic source. But if it were true, what of it, if there was nothing to pay with? But the gentleman means more; he means substantially to allege, what was directly alleged by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] that all assets were eaten up by excessive or illegal fees of the officials having the charge of the cases and the property. Is this true? Are the district judges, clerks, marshals, registers, and assignees in bankruptcy a set of villains, plunderers, and thieves, as intimated by one and boldly declared by another?

Does the gentleman claim we are to have no laws for the collection of debts? If we have, have they not got to be enforced by some sort of officials? What reason is there to believe these officials are not as honest and competent as any other? None that I am aware of. But the assignee, the man who has the whole charge of the bankrupt estate, the administrator upon it—he is chosen by the creditors themselves. Is there something so poisonous about the bankrupt law that a man selected by the creditors themselves must necessarily steal the property intrusted to him?

I have heard complaint of the amount of fees of clerks and marshals in my own State and in others. The truth is, I believe the fees are too high, and should be reduced. Is there the slightest difficulty in fixing a fee bill for those officers that shall not be too high?

But my time is nearly run, and I must omit most that I wish to say. I should regard the repeal of the existing bankrupt law as most disastrous. It has now been nearly seven years in operation—long enough to have its defects all known and discovered. Now we can amend and perfect the system intelligently and make it as near perfect as a bankrupt law can be. But I fear this law is to follow in the wake of others, and be repealed in a spasm. The history of bankrupt laws in this country has been that Congress would refuse to pass one until the ranks of the victims of commercial disaster had become full and the swell of complaints too long and too loud to be resisted; then a bankrupt law would be passed and the victims released. As soon as the great pressure was over it was easy for some slight reason to get up a reaction, and in a spasm repeal the law. I hope we may have grown wiser, and, like every other commercial country, have a steady, well-adjusted, and regulated system of bankruptcy to keep the commercial business of the country where it may at least know its liabilities and its remedies. But I fear the law will go as others have gone, and that another generation of commercial wrecks must founder and be exiled for years in insolvency to again re-enact it.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I wish to suggest that half an hour longer be allowed for debate, to be divided into five-minute speeches.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit that suggestion at the end of the time now allowed for debate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I should like to have time allotted to me to close the debate.

The SPEAKER. It will require unanimous consent of the House to extend the time allowed for debate.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I object.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, the repeal of unwise laws, which in their administration have been fruitful of evil rather than productive of good results, is not to be deprecated. The legislation of every state and nation will furnish examples of the enactment of measures believed to be promotive of the public good, and intended for the benefit of the people, but which in their practical developments have shown the folly of the most prudent and experienced legislators in dealing with questions affecting the varied interests of a great people. Our Federal statutes are by no means an exception; and it is quite safe to foretell that, in the various methods suggested by our financial wiseacres, from the Cabinet along the line to the petty Wall street broker, for the amendment of our laws on banking and currency, the Forty-third Congress will be prolific of many statutes that will be to the distraction and further derangement of our national finances, and by no means a source of relief to the business interests depressed and suffering from the unwise and ruinous policy of the governing powers of the country. In this very hour of distress, when the commercial interests of the country are crying aloud for relief—a voice which is re-echoed from every quarter and every class of trade—this House, when the cry is for bread, is about to offer a stone to soothe the afflicted and fill with plenty a great commercial nation famishing for wise and cautious legislation. To still the rising storm, to heal the wounds which have brought ruin to some and chronic disease to many of the most prosperous enterprises in which a great commercial nation is engaged, we are about to repeal a law which a few years ago was regarded as wise and salutary legislation, and which, with all its confessed and imputed errors, has been proven to be the highest safeguard and protection to every honest business man, and the surest guarantee against the enormous frauds and the corrupt practices which evil-minded men and gigantic corporations are ever ready to commit—a repeal which is demanded in the interest of the money kings whose sway, if permitted much longer to shape the policy of the Government and direct its laws, will end in serfdom for all but the wealthy and corrupt, the throttling of the Republic, and the consummation of the empire.

The bankrupt law, Mr. Speaker, was intended to afford a remedy for many existing evils. Commercial intercourse between our citizens of the several States must ever remain unrestricted, and so long as the laws of the States differ from each other, or conflict on matters affecting trade and commerce, no other system of insolvency than one of Federal authority will be at all sufficient for the protection of the commercial classes. Where business is done on a cash basis, no laws for the protection of debtor or creditor can be required; but the credit system, which has a universal field, demands laws regulating and controlling the action of all engaged. Besides, sir, the credit system is necessary for the life of trade, and especially so for those whose capital is limited. It is an axiom of finance that whatever interferes with or intercepts credit works an injury to the man of limited capital. Our legislation should include all classes in its practical effects; it should be general in its character; not in the interest of the few; though by that means colossal fortunes are built up and great enterprises sustained. Millions of our people should not suffer that some gigantic railroad corporation may swell until, in an unpropitious moment, it burst, and thousands of investors be stranded on the shore of bankruptcy. We have had some examples of that during the present panic, and gentlemen on the other side of the House are not entirely free from the responsibility.

The bankrupt act is thoroughly understood, and amendments are now before the Judiciary Committee which would relieve it of all its harsh and impracticable features. The asperity with which some cynics have spoken and written of it is not justified. Ample provision against fraud on the part of the failing debtor has been made—fraud concocted before bankruptcy is exposed; and herein, I surmise, will be found the powerful motive impelling many seeking its repeal. Dishonest and corrupt depositaries of the people's money are shaking with fear of the fate in view if their unfaithfulness is unveiled to the public eye. Rush on to the national capital, besiege Congress, move on their works; raise the cry of repeal, succeed, and we are safe from the institution of proceedings which would rend asunder the column of our seeming prosperity and Christian guardianship of public funds, and drag to the light the hideous specter of our foul and infamous betrayal of our trust.

Mr. Speaker, when a commercial house fails, how is the estate to be wound up? How is the property or the funds to be distributed to the creditors? Under the insolvent laws of a State the foreign creditor is often protected, paid, perhaps, in full—for State insolvent laws are void as to all creditors out of the State—and the domestic creditors may obtain nothing. The foreign creditors can attach the funds in the hands of the insolvents' trustee and make their claim. The domestic creditor is set aside, and has the same share that Lazarus enjoyed from the rich man's table. This is the law recognized by the decisions of the court of appeals in Maryland, a very high authority; and I presume it is law in every State in the Union. The bankrupt act establishes absolute uniformity; no preferences are allowed, and equal rights guaranteed to all claimants. Besides, sir, its practice is simple and effective, and the clause requiring a 50 per cent. payment by the bankrupt has a universal influence, inhibiting honest business men from sacrificing their entire assets and thus protecting the creditors from the release of debtors whose fraudulent or indifferent conduct prevents their compliance with the law requiring so large a payment to obtain a release.

There is no alternative for a settlement with creditors except a resort to an arrangement. Assignments for the benefit of creditors have sprung from the defects of the State insolvent system; they are of American origin, never having been used in England, where a wise and equitable system of bankruptcy affords abundant relief in all cases of commercial insolvency. In many of the States where the insolvent laws prevail they are regulated by laws which are by no means uniform in their application. Thus when the alternative, the assignment for benefit of creditors, is resorted to it becomes impossible to make it have application to all creditors; it may provide for all but a big fish, in whose rapacious maw the whole estate will speedily disappear by the process of attachment well known to all lawyers, and which, ofttimes, is not invoked in vain, to the great consternation of perhaps more deserving creditors.

The involuntary feature of the bankrupt law may have promoted much distress, and has no doubt often been availed of to gratify other motives than contemplated by the law-makers. It is not without some compensating benefits. The fact that a suspension of payment of commercial paper for a few days is an act of bankruptcy has in a multitude of instances impelled business men to guard their transactions with an eye single to their certain ability to pay all paper at maturity. It has proved a great check to inflated trade, and has been a strong motive to healthy business, and confined speculation. If it has been productive of more evil than good, strike it out; prune the vine if you will; let its decayed branches be sundered; but destroy it not by tearing up the roots because of evils more imaginary than real.

I have adverted to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that England has provided a bankrupt law which is admirable in its effects.

Perhaps the country from which we have derived the common law, and which is the chief commercial nation of the world, affords no example for our imitation in this regard. Some of our ablest lawyers have a lingering respect for her laws, and ofttimes quote her jurists as a guide for our own judges when patriotism has no play and on special principle of loyalty, as that word was erst understood, needed vindication. But, Mr. Speaker, assignments for benefit of creditors not being required in England, a fruitful field for fees, far in excess of any allowances under the bankrupt law, which is very common in America, is comparatively unknown in England. I allude to a feature of our law reports which is without a parallel in any country—suits to set aside fraudulent conveyances, deeds made to defraud creditors and to enrich the debtor and his family at the expense of his honest creditors. Over five thousand such cases are reported in the American decisions, and they represent but a tithe of the numberless undiscovered transactions whereby fraud triumphs to the injury and oppression of the honest creditors. The bankrupt law affords the only and a summary relief. I have said that these fraudulent contrivances are comparatively unknown in England. Need it be inquired why? My friends on the other side of the House who are moving for the repeal of this law would be slow to admit the superiority of moral character and business integrity of the commercial classes in England over this free land, where the Christian statesman presides in the temple of government and the pious and Puritan element is so strongly represented in business and financial circles. They would be entirely right in their denial of such claim for England, for the hearts of our people are honest and incorruptible in the many, and the few, I ween, are well provided with examples of the Christian statesmen and Puritans referred to.

No, Mr. Speaker, our deficiencies arose from the imperfections of our laws, and the repeal of the bankrupt act will assuredly prove the forerunner, not of any improvement or reform in the ways of trade and commerce, but of a renewal of the corrupt practices and mischiefs against which it was intended to act as a breakwater and sure protection.

I have not the time to further demonstrate the viciousness of a repeal of the law. It has been protested against by business men in all parts of our country, and many are awaiting the issue of this agitation for repeal with dire forebodings.

I desire to state to the House that the Board of Trade of Baltimore have unanimously petitioned against the repeal of this law. Recognizing its many deficiencies, the merchants of the commercial metropolis of the South have nevertheless resolved that the bankrupt law is a great protection to all commercial credits, and is in the main a wise and salutary measure.

I incorporate the resolution:

Resolved, That it is the conviction of this board that the preservation of the bankrupt law is necessary for the protection of commercial credits, the equal distribution of assets, and the release of the honest although unfortunate bankrupt; and, while admitting its several defects, we regard it, as a whole, superior to the old State insolvent laws, to which the country would be remanded by its abrogation.

Mr. Speaker, the judgment of the commercial men who adopted that resolution is worthy of the highest consideration and respect. Their prudent course in the conduct of their business affairs has been amply demonstrated during the recent crisis. Their investments stood the test of the fiery ordeal that, as a besom of destruction, swept over the country, carrying desolation and ruin to many whose mercantile position seemed impregnable. The mercantile community of Maryland stood as a wall of brass, as firm as gates of steel—no break, no dismay; their unimpeachable integrity suffered no blemish; no shoddy fortunes were impaled on the horns of the bulls nor consumed by ravishing bears; no putrid carcasses left to fatten birds of prey and mark the line of battle. They rested confidently in the assurance of their own legitimate trade and finance, without fear of disaster; and when the storm had passed they resumed their steady and prosperous career in the avenues of lawful trade and commerce.

The repeal of this law, Mr. Speaker, is not demanded in the interest of the commercial classes. They have doubtless considered the wholesome effects of its provisions in creating a proper view of the great responsibility for the payment of debts, especially so by the great corporations whose solvency is almost guaranteed by the law if the strictest management of their affairs can promote so important an end. In case of insolvency the law affords ample remedies against corporations, and the advantages secured to the bondholder will be readily appreciated.

I desire in the short time allowed me, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the country to the amendments offered in the Senate providing for composition deeds.

This is an important and highly useful feature of the English bankrupt system. It enables a majority of creditors, under proper and equitable conditions, to force refractory creditors to assent to a fair compromise without any of the ordinary proceedings in bankruptcy; and an estate may be settled up to the greatest advantage of the creditors without unnecessary hardship to the bankrupt, who may be employed to aid and assist in settling up his affairs. But, sir, the provisions of the pending bill afford no such security. It is manifestly the emanation of Jay Cooke & Co. and their fraudulent brethren, intended to whitewash the gigantic frauds perpetrated by the banking and railroad corporations which have brought us to the verge of national bankruptcy.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will remark that while I have little faith that this House will recede from its apparent determination to repeal the bankrupt act, I have less faith in the efficacy of such legislation to cure the financial distemper that afflicts the country. Whatever its results may be I will not bear the responsibility. If I have protested in vain I will still have the consciousness that I did not fail to discharge my duty.

Mr. POTTER. I gave my assent in the Committee on the Judiciary to a bill to repeal the bankrupt law, saving pending rights and cases. I am not satisfied that the bill reported does not do more than that. Upon reading it I am inclined to think that one of the special provisions which it makes for pending cases is unconstitutional, and I am not entirely satisfied with the others. I trust, therefore, that my colleague on the committee will allow some amendment to the bill to be voted upon, striking out all but its first and last sections, which would be equivalent to adopting the substitute of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCRARY,] or, except as to the official fees, equivalent to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] which I prefer.

In regard to the propriety of repealing the law, I have no doubt whatever. The law has two parts to it—one for voluntary, the other for involuntary proceedings to bankruptcy. These parts are entirely distinct. I should not oppose the retention of a proper measure to permit honest debtors to surrender their property and be relieved from their debts. But I am satisfied that a law could be framed for that purpose much simpler and better than this, and free from the cumbersome and embarrassing machinery which attends the existing bankrupt law, and therefore I do not think any one should seek to now retain the so-called voluntary clause of this law.

As regards the involuntary part of the law, I ask the House to take notice of the fact that the gentlemen who have spoken here this morning urging us to retain these provisions in the interest of creditors are generally from sections of the country which are less interested in the law as creditors than are the people of those sections of the country whose Representatives have urged the repeal of the act. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] who has just spoken, and who tells us that justice to creditors requires the retention of this law, tells us also that there is no State in the Union less interested in the subject than the State he represents. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON,] who also favors the continuance of the law, spoke expressly for himself, and not for his constituents. But so far as any expression has been given of the wish of the people of the great creditor centers of the country, so far as they have spoken by their Representatives in this House this morning, they have spoken uniformly in favor of the repeal of these provisions of the law.

The gentlemen who seek to retain the law tell us it is "necessary" for the interest of creditors to have a permanent Federal bankrupt law. But that is only their theory. I claim that the practical workings of the law have been such as to show that its continuance is of no use to either debtors or creditors. There have been in operation in this country, in the last eighty-five years, not only this law, but two other bankrupt laws before this. The result has been that when these laws, enacted after some great commercial revulsion, have been used by debtors to wipe out their debts, they have then been repealed, and no other bankrupt law enacted until the next generation. These bankrupt laws have come, it will be remembered, about twenty-five years apart. Such was the fate of the law of 1817, and also of the law of 1842. And so far as the people, through their Representatives in this House, have been able to express their opinion upon this law, we may assume such will be its fate also.

Gentlemen talk about haste in passing an important measure like this without debate. But the question is not of enacting a new law, but of repealing one which has been six years in operation. The action of the last House of Representatives showed how entirely the people were satisfied that this law should not be longer retained. It is a subject about which the country is perfectly informed. It is very well to talk about protecting the interest of the creditors by making debtors distribute their estates fairly. But, after all, whether this law does that wisely, and should be preserved or not, is a practical question; and upon that question the sense of the country, so far as I am informed, is all one way. Among my own clients—I practice law in the city of New York, and my clients are mainly of the creditor class—I have heard but one opinion expressed, and that has been uniformly against the law.

My colleague from the first district of our State, [Mr. SCUDDER,] also a lawyer, and having a large practice in the city of New York, told me yesterday that he had never heard among his clients any desire whatever expressed to retain this law. So far as I have heard from any of my colleagues as to the wishes of their constituencies upon this subject, their testimony has been uniformly the same. So with regard to the distinguished gentleman from Chicago, [Mr. WARD,] the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the other gentlemen representing great commercial centers, who either in the Committee on the Judiciary or upon the floor of this House have expressed their views; they all demand a repeal of this law.

My friend from the Saint Louis district of Missouri, [Mr. STONE,] who is a large manufacturer there, tells me that he has had numerous cases in bankruptcy in that State, and in no one has he ever received a dividend of more than 10 per cent.; and you have heard from my colleague on the committee [Mr. TREMAIN] that out of eighteen hundred cases in the city of New Orleans but one paid a respectable dividend. From all over the country comes a cry against the charges and management of estates in the bankrupt court, until, as I heard one gentleman say, it should be written over the doors of that court, "When any estate enters here its creditors should leave all hope behind."

Yet at the end of six years of trial of this law gentlemen come to us from sections of the country not interested in this bill, with their theories, and tell us that it is the right of creditors to have a bankrupt law, and that it is provided for in the Constitution of the United States. But, Mr. Speaker, this is the third time Congress has tried the enactment of such a law, and each time failed to frame one which, after its temporary purpose of discharging a great class of pressing debtors was answered, the people wanted retained. When gentlemen say that this law should be retained in the interest of creditors I repeat that in a measure of this kind the persons most affected by it are those best competent to judge and to guide us; and, so far as I am informed, these persons—the creditors of the country—almost without dissent, are against the continuance of the present bankrupt law; first, because the estate goes into the hands of persons without interest in its good management, and is largely absorbed by enormous charges and fees; secondly, because the law tends to interfere with those arrangements which creditors would make with the debtor for the distribution of what property he has left; and thirdly, because it permits the bankrupt court to interfere between the creditor and the debtor, and suspend the creditor's exercise of his legal rights and the realization of his securities during its pleasure, and thus by making the creditor the servant of the debtor or of the bankrupt court prevents creditors lending, and adds to that distrust and locking up of means which, in periods like that of a few week since, are so disastrous.

The nature of trade and credit in this country is such that in commercial business few men fail until they have paid out all their available means. The frequent practice of the country before this bankrupt law was for creditors to arrange with their failing debtors according as they found for their common interest. But Congress came in with its bankrupt law, and placed it in the power of any one creditor to put the debtor and his estate into the bankrupt court, to set aside all arrangements except ratable distribution in the court, and to put all the debtor's property into the hands of a lot of officials who have no interest but to make fees out of it, under a law inviting to conflicts of jurisdiction and dispute. The result has been that in many—indeed I think in most—cases, the creditors of the bankrupt regard bankruptcy as the end of their hopes of payment. Why, then, seek to retain a law which the persons whom it is said to benefit desire to have repealed?

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] says himself the law is defective and that it should be amended, and he thinks it can be amended. Sir, we have been talking this morning for two hours about this law, and have heard from both sides of the House suggestions enough from the gentlemen who seek to retain and amend it to occupy the Committee on the Judiciary the entire session. We passed through the House during the last Congress a bill to repeal the bankrupt law; it went to the Senate, and was referred to their Committee on the Judiciary, and they, not favoring the repeal, spent the entire session seeking in some way to amend it, and the result was that they agreed upon nothing. And if we do not repeal the law now, we shall have exactly that experience repeated at this session. Why should gentlemen seek to retain, that they may amend and doctor, a law which even debtors no longer need, for the benefit of a creditor class who do not desire it? If that shall be done the session will come to an end without any practical relief being afforded to the community. I trust therefore that the special provision in the bill reported will be struck out, and a bill repealing the law, without affecting existing cases, be passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire, with the leave of the House, to explain the theory upon which the Committee on the Judiciary acted in regard to this bankrupt law, without disclosing, I hope, improperly any of the secrets of the committee. We first considered the question whether there should be a repeal. Upon that there was a great diversity of opinion. A large number of the committee, but not a majority, desired there should be no repeal; and a majority of the committee, of course, were in favor of repeal. Then it was agreed on all hands that in case there was a repeal there must be provisions to suspend pending proceedings and to wind them up.

The theory upon which we proceeded in regard to those proceedings was this: That if there was to be a repeal, then pending proceedings should be brought as near no bankrupt law as possible, because, having repealed the bankrupt law for all men hereafter, it was quite unfair to keep these stringent provisions operating upon those people who happened to be caught within its toils before the repeal could go into effect.

I am very desirous this question should be settled here, and now, because if it is known that the matter will be pending here for any considerable time, fraudulent debtors and creditors desiring to drive men into bankruptcy will take advantage of the delay and rush everybody in as long as they can, in order to get the advantage of the law. We have therefore provided that in regard to pending proceedings, when a majority of the creditors choose to take the property into their own hands and deal with it themselves, equally and fairly, they shall have that power, and the debtors shall be no longer under the stringent provisions of the law.

This seemed to us just, and we therefore undertook to devise provisions which would meet this object. We agreed that when a majority of the creditors declared their willingness to permit the debtor to wind up his affairs for their benefit, or to take the property into their hands to administer it for their benefit, they should have that right, with the single limitation that there should be an equal distribution among all the creditors.

Now, there has been some criticism upon that provision; but there is one clause to which gentlemen making this criticism may not have had their attention drawn, because it is apparently out of its place. The clause to which I refer is as follows: "And the provisions of such resolution or agreement shall inure equally to the benefit of all the creditors of such bankrupt, or alleged bankrupt;" so that the majority cannot make any provision for themselves which does not operate equally to the benefit of every creditor, however small.

A criticism has also been made in regard to the number of creditors that may join in this agreement. I will answer that criticism by mentioning a case which occurred within my own knowledge. The present provisions of the bankrupt law require an assignee to be chosen and certain proceedings to be had by a majority in number and value of the creditors. There was a man in our section of the country who failed, owing about sixty thousand dollars, about three thousand dollars being due to some six or seven hundred sewing girls who had been in his employ, and whom he expected to employ afterward. Those sewing girls, whose claims amounted to but $3,000 out of the $60,000, came in and controlled the whole proceedings to the exclusion of the creditors who constituted the majority in value.

A MEMBER. Why should they not?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Because persons whose claims amounted to but $3,000 controlled the disposition of the estate of the bankrupt, without reference to the wishes of other creditors whose claims amounted to nearly sixty thousand dollars. In this respect we have modified the existing law.

I do not think that our provision in this respect is open to the objection of my learned colleague, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] who suggested that it was not constitutional because it is not a "uniform system of bankruptcy." I beg to differ with the gentleman. It operates upon all alike. Besides, if the provision is unconstitutional it will not do anybody any harm as it will be declared invalid by the courts.

I was sorry to hear brought in, on this question, personal allusions to a particular gentleman. I have not time, nor is it my province, to enter into any defense or eulogy of his action, or any animadversion upon his character. But, sir, he is to be treated like every other unfortunate banker. He periled a great estate in what I believe to be a fruitless enterprise; he is now in bankruptcy. If his creditors have such confidence in him that they are willing to intrust to him the settlement of his estate, why should they not be permitted to manage their own affairs in their own way? Why should we interfere?

I have not spoken at all, nor do I intend to speak, upon the general question of repeal, because I suppose upon that question the whole House is substantially united. The matter does not make any difference to my constituents, for in Massachusetts we have an insolvent law to take the place substantially of a national bankrupt law. But if the House should vote for this bill the effect will be that as to pending cases they will be worked out exactly as the majority in value of the creditors by solemn resolution agree.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Is the Judiciary Committee of the opinion that the feature of the existing law which prohibits preference of creditors by debtors ought to be abolished?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If you continue that provision you retain a bankrupt law of some sort. Every State must settle for itself about such preferences. If we repeal the bankrupt law we wipe out that provision as a national matter.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Might not this feature be continued, and the State courts be given jurisdiction of the question?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The two hours, to which the House directed the debate on this question to be limited, have expired.

Mr. TREMAIN. Having charge of the bill on behalf of the committee, I would like to occupy about three minutes to close the debate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Say ten.

Mr. TREMAIN. The gentleman from Massachusetts suggests ten minutes. I will ask five.

Mr. POLAND. The debate has been closed by a gentleman on that side. I must object to an extension of the time for the benefit of that side.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] yields to me that I may ask the House by unanimous consent to extend the debate for another hour, to be occupied in five-minute speeches.

Several members objected.

Mr. TREMAIN. The debate being closed, and the remarks of the chairman of the committee [Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts] being entirely satisfactory to me, I now withdraw the motion to recommit, and call the previous question, so as to bring the House to a direct vote on the bill.

Mr. BECK. Will not the gentleman consent to any amendment being offered?

Mr. TREMAIN. I have no objection to their being read.

Mr. BECK. They have been read. I desire a vote on my amendment.

Mr. TREMAIN. I must ask a vote at once on the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to know, Mr. Speaker, whether the motion to recommit can be withdrawn so as to carry with it the proposed amendment to the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Certainly. It is the uniform practice of the House that an amendment, being withdrawn, withdraws the amendment to that amendment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] withdraws the motion to recommit, and demands the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the Chair to inform the House whether there is any way in which a motion to recommit can be brought before the House other than by voting down the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows no other way. On seconding the demand for the previous question the Chair will direct that the vote be taken by tellers, and appoints as tellers the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask a parliamentary question, not for my own information, but for that of others who may not have been here so long as myself. If the previous question should be voted down, will not the bill then be open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. MELLISH. Can we have a division of the question by sections?

The SPEAKER. No, sir; the rules do not permit it.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 121.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BECK. I now offer my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize those who have had amendments read in the order in which the amendments were read. The gentleman from Kentucky is the first in order.

Mr. BECK. I move to amend the bill as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of the bill the following:

SEC. 2. That all suits and proceedings now pending in the courts of the United States, wherein adjudication for bankruptcy has been made, shall be proceeded with and governed by the provisions of existing law, which are hereby continued in force only for the purpose of closing up suits and proceedings now pending: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act, fees, commissions, and charges of the officers and agents of the court in bankrupt cases shall be reduced to one-half of the fees, commissions, and charges heretofore allowed.

Mr. BECK. I call the previous question on the bill and on the amendment, if I have the right to do so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That cuts off all other amendments.

Mr. McCRARY. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will let me offer an amendment.

Mr. BECK. I desire to test the sense of the House.

Mr. SENER. Is it in order to move that all amendments be printed and the further consideration of the question postponed?

The SPEAKER. Not when the previous question has been demanded.

Mr. DONNAN. I hope all amendments which have been proposed will be again read.

Mr. BECK. I do not object to that.

Mr. McCRARY. I hope the gentleman will allow me to offer an amendment to his amendment, or at least to allow it to be read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is not in order, pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. McCRARY. The gentleman from Kentucky yields to me to allow the amendment to be read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] asks whether the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] will allow him to move an amendment striking out the words from his amendment "wherein adjudication for bankruptcy has been made."

Mr. BECK. I will not.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I should like the gentleman from Kentucky to so modify his motion as to have the vote first on his amendment and then on the bill as amended.

The SPEAKER. What point does the gentleman gain by that?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Simply to give the House an opportunity first to vote on his amendment. There are gentlemen who will gladly vote for the amendment who will not be willing to vote for the bill as amended.

The SPEAKER. The question now is merely on seconding the demand for the previous question; and if that be done the vote will be first on the gentleman's amendment and then on the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 138, noes 26.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. BECK's amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs, Shall the bill, as amended, be engrossed and ordered to a third reading?

Mr. SENER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POTTER. Is this upon the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not, but upon the engrossment and third reading.

Mr. POTTER. I hope by consent the yeas and nays will be taken as ordered on the passage of the bill, thus saving the time of the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that course will be taken.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 219, nays 44, not voting 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barber, Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Begole, Berry, Biery, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Roderick R. So the bill was passed.

Mr. BECK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, rose.

Mr. COX. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky was recognized by the Chair for that purpose, and the usual motion to reconsider has been made and that motion laid upon the table. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has the floor.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to state what I wanted? I desired to move to reconsider this bill with the view of having the action of the House on the following proviso prepared by my friend from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER:]

Amend the first section of the bill by inserting at the end of the section the following: "Provided that the repeal hereby enacted shall not in any way be applicable to corporations."

The SPEAKER. The bill is now past the stage where that would be in order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, communicated to the House by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 24) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to reduce duties on imports and to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes,'" approved March 3, 1873.

A bill (S. No. 89) in relation to the lines of telegraph connecting the Capitol and the various Departments of the Government; and

A bill (S. No. 194) in relation to the monument erected to the memory of the Chevalier de Ternay.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman from Maine to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I cannot yield to anything.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to ask non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate to the loan bill, and have them sent to a committee of conference. Here is a $20,000,000 loan coming due on the first day of January, which must be provided for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] is recognized; the balance he must do himself. [A laugh.]

Mr. DAWES. I ask but a minute.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I cannot yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine will proceed.

REPEAL OF THE SALARY BILL.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The committee upon the salary bill (H. R. No. 471) to whom the subject was recommitted, has considered the instructions of the House, and authorizes me to report the bill which I send to the desk to be read.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I desire to ask, as a question of order, whether this bill takes precedence of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It does; because on the recommittal of the bill the committee was authorized to report at any time. On the previous reference of the subject, they were authorized to report after the morning hour; on the recommittal the language of the reference was changed.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Maine that we have the morning hour, and that he then call up his bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not agree to that.

The SPEAKER. The committee on the salary revision report the following bill, which will be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 793) to repeal the increase of certain salaries and to establish the rate of the same.

Be it enacted, &c., That all provisions in an act entitled "An act to provide for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873, that increase the salary or compensation of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates in Congress, or of any officer or employé, are hereby repealed, except so far as the same relate to the judges of the Supreme Court, and to the President of the United States, during his present term of office.

SEC. 2. Hereafter the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress shall be at the rate of $5,500 per annum; and this shall be in lieu of all allowances except the actual and necessary individual traveling expenses in coming to and returning from the national capital once each session, which shall be paid to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate on the same being certified by him to the proper accounting officer; and the salary or compensation of all officers and employés of the Government, subject to the exceptions named in section 1 of this act, shall hereafter be the same that they were prior to the passage of the act named in said section.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is required to cover into the Treasury all sums that may remain undrawn, or which have been received as increased compensation under the provisions of said act, approved March 3, 1873, and which shall have or may come into his possession by the return thereof.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read the motion submitted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] under which the committee acted.

The Clerk read as follows:

To report a bill repealing the whole salary act, so far as the same can be constitutionally done, except the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court, and to ascertain the average amount of salary, mileage, and all other allowances, (exclusive of any estimate for the use of the franking privilege,) paid to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-first Congress; and to report a bill forthwith determining the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of Congress hereafter at the amount, as near as practicable, thus ascertained, with necessary traveling expenses, and restoring all other salaries as they were before the passage of said act.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The bill has not yet been printed, for this reason: during the day, yesterday, I endeavored to get the floor for the purpose of moving to have the bill printed, but was prevented by the objection of different members of the House, and so gave it up. Last night, just before the adjournment, the Speaker obtained from the House an order to have the bill printed. I did not know of it until this morning. Immediately on learning that the order had been given, I sent the bill down to the Government Printing Office. It will be here before long in a printed form, and placed on the desks of members.

Members will see from the instructions just read by the Clerk that very little scope was left to the committee. The bill itself in some particulars does not suit me; in some regards it will not suit others. On that point I may speak for members of the committee. But what the committee did was to follow out the spirit of the instructions, and that was to lump the whole mileage, and then distribute it as salary among the members. The matter was confined to the Forty-first Congress, in making the reckoning, by the terms of the instructions moved by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] and adopted by the House. The committee, not trusting to anything less than an official report, obtained from the Register of the Treasury a complete and accurate list, which I hold in my hand, of the mileage paid to every member of the Forty-first Congress, and also to every Senator, which I also hold in my hand, upon another sheet. The list is in detail, showing what each member and each Senator received. That, of course, was not needed; but the office wished to make their reply to my request exhaustive. The committee took simply the aggregate of the mileage to the members of the Forty-first Congress, which amounted to $209,542.40, paid to two hundred and sixty-five members in all. The mileage to the Senate was $71,382.40, paid to seventy-two Senators. The aggregate of the two amounts was $280,924.80. We of course have divided that amount by the aggregate number of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, making as the average for the whole Congress $833.60 for two years, or for one year $416.80. To that the committee, acting under instructions, added $125 for stationery allowance, making an average of allowance for mileage and stationery, the franking privilege being excluded by the terms of the instructions, of $541.80. Under the instructions to report a bill as near this as practicable, the committee took the responsibility of fixing an even sum, and they took the nearest hundred dollars, being $5,500, cutting off $41.80, which I presume no gentleman will object to. The bill is therefore reported under the instructions, fixing the salary at the rate of $5,500 hereafter for members of Congress, and is made, in terms as distinct as the committee could make them, to be in lieu of all allowances whatever, except—and there the language of the instructions is followed—actual individual necessary expenses of Senators, Members, and Delegates in coming from their residences to the national capital and returning to them, to be duly certified to the accounting officers. The bill is amended, also, according to the instructions, so as to embrace all officials, with the exceptions referred to in the instructions, to wit, the justices of the Supreme Court and the President of the United States during his present term of office. After fixing the salaries of members of Congress, all other salaries, in accordance with instructions, are put back at the rate that they were under the law previous to the passage of the act of March 3, 1873, all that part of it which is commonly known as the salary bill.

Now, the committee in doing this have endeavored to follow strictly the instructions of the House, and have presented this bill in accordance with those instructions. If I were left entirely unhampered I should call the previous question on the bill, but the arrangement of the House the other day, if I remember it correctly, provided for some discussion, and in order that it may be before the House, as showing that the course I pursue is the just and proper one, I ask that the order be read from the desk.

The SPEAKER. The journal of that day is not here, but the Chair thinks he can state what the order of the House was; it was that the bill should be considered as in Committee of the Whole, under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That will leave it open to amendment.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. And the time to which the discussion on this bill shall run is left to the discretion of the House itself. I believe that there is a general desire, in accordance with the strong desire outside of this House, that this matter should be brought to a speedy close, and I indicate that I shall move the previous question after certain amendments have been offered. There is one which I believe will be immediately offered, making the bill retroactive to the 4th of March last, so that it will apply to this Congress and subsequent Congresses. There is another amendment which will be proposed, proposing to make the salary $5,000 instead of $5,500, which would suit me for one better than the bill as it is reported.

Mr. LEACH. There will be an amendment proposing to restore the franking privilege.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. When these amendments shall have been offered I propose to call the previous question, and of course the House can, in its wisdom and pleasure, overrule me if it sees fit.

Mr. KASSON. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the close of the second section of the bill:

Provided, That Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in the Forty-third Congress who shall have received their compensation since the 4th of March, 1873, in accordance with the provisions of the act hereby repealed, shall hereafter be paid only such equal monthly installments as shall in the aggregate make their compensation severally from the 4th of March, 1873, to the close of the present Congress equal to the amount of salary herein provided.

I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that that amendment explains itself. I offer it in order that the entire compensation of members of Congress for this Forty-third Congress shall only amount to the figure provided for in this bill. I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MCKEE.]

Mr. MCKEE. I do not rise for the purpose of supporting the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON;] neither do I rise for the purpose of supporting the report of the committee, for I do not believe in it. I do not believe in reducing our pay lower than it was before. Nor do I believe in this humbug and sham that have been exhibited to such an extent in this House about this back-pay bill. The American people may tolerate humbug, but they hate sham and despise demagogery.

I wonder how many men there are on this floor who think they can deceive their constituents in this matter by their hot haste to secure the repeal of this obnoxious salary bill. Sir, away down in the bottom of their hearts, if left to themselves, how many would vote for this repeal? Do not the people know that if this bill was left to its own inherent strength, uninfluenced by the force of popular clamor, it would hardly have force enough to raise a ripple in this congressional flood? That is the truth; and why not say so? Yet gentlemen are so anxious to relieve themselves of this obnoxious pay that they are willing to come up here and vote that they have acted wrongfully in taking it. Now, all this is to make the people believe that they are the only pure, true, and virtuous members. They wish merely to humbug the people. It is not because they are anxious to relieve themselves of this back pay, for that is not true. There is hardly a member here who, away down in the bottom of his heart, wants to have this law repealed.

Now, if this matter is to go before the country I want it to go to the people in its true light, just exactly as it is. It is a great deal like the old Scotchman. He put a guinea into the plate when he intended to put in but a shilling. Finding out his mistake, he desired to take it out, but the old deacon refused to allow him to do so, saying he could not take back what had been once given to the Lord. "Well," said the old Scotchman, "I hope you will give me credit for the guinea I have given." "No;" said the deacon, "the Lord will give you credit only for the shilling you intended to give." Now I hope the people will give these gentlemen credit for the shilling they intended to give.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out the second section of this bill. I shall require only a few minutes, and should not require them were it not that one's vote is so easily misunderstood.

I have heard very little said in my district against this salary, most who have spoken to me approving the $7,500.

I was in this city last February and March when this matter of increase of salaries was being talked over, and so far as I had opportunity advised against any increase of compensation to members of Congress. I was then and am now in favor of a larger increase than was voted to members of the Cabinet, Vice-President, and Speaker. I am now in favor of restoring the old rate of $5,000, with mileage and stationery, or a compromise of $6,000 per year, to go back to the 4th of March, 1873. Personally I am not opposed to the mileage, as I think that those who come from the far West ought to have larger pay than we on the Atlantic, but as there is such a general conviction that it is a bad system, I am in favor of yielding to the views of others. I should therefore prefer, if the opportunity offers, to vote in favor of $6,000 per annum, from the 4th of last March, and make that the permanent pay. As to our services being worth more or less than that sum, I do not think it a part of the case. I think the most of us are here because we wished to be, independently of all considerations of pay. It is worth more than any salary to be the choice of our constituency, and the honor of a seat in either House is of more value to the most of us than any compensation could be. I think the larger part of this Congress are equal in all respects, and superior in many, to those heroes and statesmen of antiquity referred to in the eloquent remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] or those eminent American statesmen named in the finished speech of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON.] Therefore, I for one, feel honored in having a seat here, and while favoring a restoration of the former salary of $5,000, I shall accept and be satisfied with any compensation that shall be decided upon. I now withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] by substituting therefor the following:

For the purpose of giving due flexibility to the question of salary, and of admitting an opportunity for the exhibition and recording of a judicious self-appreciation or an equally judicious self-denial on the part of members of the House of Representatives, three classes are hereby established, to be severally denominated and known as class A, B, and C. The members of class A shall receive a salary of $7,500 per annum; those of class B shall receive $5,000 per annum; those of class C shall receive a salary of $3,000 per annum. That once in each session, at the commencement of the same, each member of the House shall set forth in writing and file with the Clerk his own choice of the class in which he elects to be placed for that session—having due regard to his own estimate of his proposed services and to the capacity for endurance in his own constituents, and such election when made shall not be changed at the same session.

Now, it is very evident that this House will never agree to this amendment, and perhaps no other provision upon this subject. Now, sir, I am ready to take the inheritance which the fathers have given me with its burdens. But for the benefit of those members of the former Congress who gave us this increase of salary, I will say that, although I do not know that it would affect me at home, I believe that the liberal sentiment of the people has been in favor of a reasonable reduction of salary. "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge."

Now, it looks to me very much as if this House did not intend to pass any practical bill upon the subject, and to help them to that conclusion I have endeavored to prepare an amendment, by means of which each gentleman can go through the difficult task of assigning a fair value to himself, and still be able perhaps to satisfy those behind him, whose opinion, after all, may vary from his own. I hope my amendment will meet with patient, honest, and faithful consideration by the House.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything upon this question. It was my purpose to let my vote upon this bill and the various amendments that have been or may be proposed to it speak for me here, and, through the Journal of this House, to those whose Representative I am. But, sir, seeing that I am to be deprived of the privilege of voting upon all the propositions now before the House, or such number of them as will enable me to fully express my ideas in regard to what our true policy is in this matter, I desire to say a few words in explanation of my position. I came into this House as the avowed advocate of retrenchment and reform.

It was upon this platform that I went before the people of my district and secured my election. And as I propose to be true to the pledges I then made and to fulfill them to the best of my ability, I would for this reason, if for no other, favor a reduction not only of our own salaries but of the salaries of all other officials which were increased by the last Congress; and in order to make this reduction effectual, I am in favor of enacting such a law as will make it begin on the 4th of March last. Where, as in case of the President—who, in my judgment, was more than all others combined responsible for this increase—we are unable by reason of a constitutional prohibition to make such reduction affect the compensation of the present incumbent, I am in favor of doing indirectly that which we cannot do directly, by withholding from him during his present term, as was proposed by the minority of the select committee, all appropriations and allowances for the officers and attendants enumerated in their substitute for the bill originally reported by the majority of the committee.

But, sir, independent of this question of economy, and waiving the question which gentlemen have discussed ably and earnestly, as to whether our compensation is at present too much or too little, there is another ground upon which I advocate reduction of the salaries. It is this: The people have demanded it; and we, as their servants, are in honor bound to obey their command. I believe in the good old democratic doctrine that this is a Government of the people; that the people are sovereign in this country, and that all public officials, high and low, should in all cases pay respect to their wishes. To disregard the universal sentiment of the people upon this question, as well known as it is to all of us, would be to abandon this fundamental principle of democracy and to assert in its stead the contrary one that we are above the people; that we, the created, are greater than the creators; and I can never yield my assent to this. I trust, therefore, that this bill will be so amended as to make our compensation $5,000 per annum, with actual traveling expenses, and to withhold from the President his increased compensation under the present law, or its equivalent, as I have indicated; and that we shall then pass the bill. By so doing we will restore, in a measure at least, that confidence which should exist between the people and their Representatives, and which, unfortunately for us, has been almost wholly destroyed by circumstances over which we had no control.

The SPEAKER. The debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. ELDREDGE. In order to submit some remarks on this question, I move an amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. An amendment to the amendment is now pending. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] withdraw his amendment to the amendment?

Mr. HURLBUT. To bring this question to a conclusion, I think I must insist on a vote.

Mr. COTTON. I wish to move a substitute.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order now. A substitute would be the last thing voted on.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] will withdraw his amendment I will renew it.

Mr. HURLBUT. Very well; with that understanding, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I renew the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I have no idea of making a speech at this time, but I desire to say a few words, mostly personal to myself. I am one of those who have been subjected to most malicious and malignant assaults on account of voting for the salary bill of the last Congress. It is, I believe, the first and only vote of mine since I have been a member of this House that has been challenged or criticised by my constituents, though I have never "dodged" a vote and never been absent from the House except from unavoidable necessity.

I have voted and spoken on most or all the great questions that have come before Congress growing out of the war, being forced too many times to vote under the operation of the previous question without opportunity for discussion or reflection. For the first time I am charged with sinister motives in casting my vote. Though, up to this time, I have said nothing in vindication of it, I have by no means ignored the fact or been indifferent to the epithets that have been uttered against me in common with others, or the unjust charges made. I voted for the bill. I will not deny it or shrink from the responsibility of the vote. I voted for it, believing in my soul that it was right and that it was for the best interest of the country that it should be passed. I believe so now. Neither the clamor of the press, the so-called voice of the people, nor the arguments of the present discussion have convinced me to the contrary. I shall not now attempt to answer. I cannot in the time I shall have allowed me even refer to the objections which have been made to the law of 1873, nor will I retort in invective upon those who have maligned me. I repeat only what is no longer denied, that the Congress had the constitutional power and the legal right to enact the law. There was, therefore, no moral wrong or vice in it. It was not "theft," "robbery," nor any other crime. There was never, in fact, any question of any real importance involved except the sum at which the salary should be fixed. Was the sum in the law too much or too little? Was it reasonable or unreasonable, just or unjust? No fault was ever found with the amount at which the salary was established by the law of 1866. And yet I assert, what I most solemnly believe, and what no honest man can after a full consideration and understanding of the subject doubt, the old law giving a salary of $5,000, with the perquisites then provided for, and the franking privilege as it then existed, was, in a pecuniary point of view, more desirable, better, for the members of Congress than the salary as now provided by law. I cannot go into the figures; I have not time to show this; but the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COMINGO] and others have demonstrated this beyond cavil or doubt. I do claim, therefore, and if time permitted could show and satisfy all honest men, that the pay of members is not too high.

I have been in Congress more than ten years. If there be any ten years of life better than any other ten, they are those when we are most mature; and in that sense I have been in Congress the best ten years of my life. I have never taken from any man during my life a dollar that did not belong to me or that I did not believe I had honestly earned. I would not do it now. I am an economical man, reared in poverty and accustomed to live upon small means. I have indulged in no extravagances, and have not even felt myself able, in view of the support of my family and the education of my children, to return or reciprocate the social courtesies and compliments that have been extended to me. And yet I now and here declare I have not been able to lay up anything or add one dollar to what I had when elected to Congress, and have not now of this world's goods as much as when first elected. My own case I supposed to be that of all those who have attended to their duties honestly and faithfully, and who were not blessed with large wealth. I suppose so now. I have conversed with many members and found their experience the same as mine. The sessions of Congress have been longer and the expenses of members far more for the last ten years than ever before. The cost of living everywhere has been greater, and especially in Washington.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to this whole debate. I have waited for arguments, for reasons to be given why this law should be repealed. It is intimated by some that it provides for the payment to members of too large a salary. And yet when it is asserted here and demonstrated by those who have spoken, demonstrated by figures, that the pay and perquisites, including the franking privilege, as it is called, under the old law was as much or more than the present pay, no answer is made, no denial even is put in.

But it is said the whole question has been before the bar of public opinion and has there been decided, and Representatives are here predicating their action, their votes, upon this decision—bowing, as they call it, to public opinion. Now, sir, I have as much respect for public opinion as any man. I believe, too, when the people have a fair chance, when they have had the opportunity to examine, to know and understand all the facts, that their judgment is very likely to be right. I bow with reverential awe to such judgment—to the judgment of the people so formed. But in order to be right it is absolutely essential that the subject should have been fairly and truthfully presented and candidly and calmly considered. When this is not the case, public opinion is quite as apt to be wrong as right. The masses can no better judge—are no more likely to be right without deliberation, without consideration, without knowledge of all the facts and circumstances—than an individual. The voice of the people is only the aggregation of the voices of individuals. If the individuals are wrong, if they are moved by caprice, or passion, or error, there is no safety or propriety in following or obeying their demands. It is the duty of the representative to examine for himself, to weigh the whole subject, to ascertain the right, and act accordingly as duty and conscience dictate. It is not true statesmanship, it is not the duty of the representative, to bow to the storm, to yield to the passion or the caprice of the multitude and surrender his individual judgment and conscience, his honest convictions, to inconsiderate clamor. There can be no government, no individual representation, no freedom or liberty even, in such case. The power that would elect a president one day would crown a king the next. I do not agree that the representative must stand with his fingers on the public pulse and bow down or rise up according as it shall beat high or low. He is the representative, not the slave of the people. He is one of the people at the same time that he represents the people. He is chosen a representative not because he has no views or opinions of his own, but because of his views and opinions, known and understood beforehand, and because he is known to be reliable in the hour of danger and trial. There is, if you please, a "higher law" than the people speaking through the press—the mere echo of the hour, an unorganized and unrecognized force, appreciated only because of its noise or the good it might do. I was elected under the Constitution, hold my office, receive my instructions, and learn my duty from the people—my constituents—through that instrument. It is the supreme law to me. They expect me—my constituents expect me—to bow in absolute submission to its requirements, and I will obey them in that or resign. I was not, I never was chosen, because I was the weakest and most submissive of my people, but rather because I was believed to be able to withstand a storm. I have stood here on this floor in opposition to the public, the general opinion of this House, of the country, resisting some of the most popular measures of the time, assaults, as I believed then and still believe, upon the Constitution, when there were only twenty-five or thirty to stand with me and share with me the taunts and jeers of the overwhelming majority, some of whom—the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] for one—admit now that they were wrongs so flagrant they will not do for precedents. The storm of public opinion does not blow now as it blew then. I remember when it was claimed that public opinion demanded the impeachment of your President, and some were foolhardy enough to insist that it ought to be done because the people demanded it, whether he was guilty or not; and there is not a statesman throughout this broad land who does not now know if that popular clamor had been obeyed it would have shivered your Constitution and Government to atoms.

Public opinion! what sacrifices has it not demanded! What crimes has it not committed! Inexorable, unrelenting, and unreasoning, it hung upon the cross the Saviour of man, and has more than once since demanded the crucifixion of the innocent. Once moved, what reason, what argument, what consideration of justice or humanity ever satiated its thirst for blood!

It is needless to multiply or suggest instances; thousands rush to the recollection of us all—both ancient and modern—where humanity, duty, and true statesmanship required, demanded the representative should resist, and not pander to, public opinion. "The voice of the people is the voice of God," is as absurd as it is irreverent and profane.

But, whether right or wrong, this question of the salaries of members, as provided for under the old law and the law of 3d of March, 1873, has never to my knowledge or belief been even fairly stated in a half dozen newspapers in the United States. Why is it that it has never been candidly discussed? Why is it that it has received only denunciation? Why have the facts been suppressed or outrageously misrepresented? It was because truth and fairness would not subserve the purpose.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] says the bill was passed at a "peculiar time." Others have intimated this, but none of them have enlightened us as to what there was peculiar in the time.

Mr. Speaker, I will state what in my opinion there was peculiar about the time, and why it is that the salary question has been so magnified out of all proportion to its importance as it has.

It was done to cover up or divert attention from the infamous Credit Mobilier transactions. The time was "peculiar," because it was just after the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] and his committee had let some light in upon that business and those concerned with it. The cry that went up all over the land was not the spontaneous outburst of indignation—the just indignation of the people—because the salaries of members and others had been increased, but Credit Mobilier had just fallen with crushing weight upon the republican party and its "Christian statesmen." Only one democrat in Congress had been found in any way implicated in that business; all the others, whatever their connection with it, were the great men, the leaders of the republican party. Some newspaper correspondents and others connected with the newspaper press of the country were more or less directly or remotely implicated. It shocked the moral sense of the country. There was no law whereby the individuals could be adequately punished, and the people stood aghast.

The party of Christian statesmen was threatened, and danger of its overthrow was imminent. Something must be done to divert attention from this great national reproach. The salary bill had been voted for by both parties. The cry was commenced; the republican press led the way. It was willing to sacrifice every republican who voted or approved of the bill, even the President of the United States, to save its Christian statesmen. The democratic press, because the republican party was in majority, and responsible for the acts of Congress, on that account joined in the cry and in the misrepresentation, or at least in not stating the case, and Credit Mobilier was in a great measure allowed to escape its just condemnation.

Sir, this is the most there was peculiar in the time. The cry has done a grand work for the republican party. The diversion has been a success. If, by the repeal of the salary bill now, they can go back to the old law with its mileage and perquisites, which will about equal, or it may be exceed, the sum provided for by the law as it now stands, they will lose nothing by it, and the people will be satisfied, because they will not under the old system know how much the representatives receive. One of the strong reasons to my mind for changing the law was that, under the old law, neither we nor our constituents knew what members did receive, and because there was great inequality and injustice in the pay of members growing out of the mileage.

Under the law of 1873 the people can see and know just what some members receive. No part of it is covered up or received in perquisites or mileage. And, sir, if it is repealed, as it probably will be, the dishonest and corrupt, by some scheme—another Credit Mobilier, it may be—will dishonestly, by deception and indirection, make up any real or seeming difference there may be between this and the law we shall pass.

I will not now argue that the back pay, as it is called, was too much or too little. But this I do contend, that the Constitution intended that each and every Congress should fix and determine the amount of the pay of its members. Whether it should determine this at the beginning or end of the Congress is of small importance.

If the Congress is competent to fix it at all, and the Constitution so declares, it is just as legitimate and safe to have it done at the end as in the beginning. And it has seemed to me that it could do so more wisely and justly at the end. It is known then what time has been occupied, what labors have been performed, and what expenses incurred by the members. These things cannot be known at the beginning. A moment's consideration, it seems to me, will satisfy any candid mind that no preceding Congress ought to fix the pay. Supposing this Congress, which will hold one session after the election of members of the next, should find that a majority were opposed to them, were of different politics to this, and should determine the salary at so small a sum that none but the rich could attend the sessions. This is not only possible, but in times of high political excitement it might be very likely to be done. Those of us who have been here during the last ten years have seen outrages quite equal to the one supposed. We have seen men turned out and elected by this House against the will of the constituency they sought to represent.

If a Congress is competent to fix its own pay at the beginning before anything has been done, and before anything can be known of the length of its sessions, or the time it will be occupied, or the labors it will perform, it certainly cannot be wrong to wait till all those things are known before it is done. This is all the meaning there is in the opprobrious term of "back pay." And, I repeat, the only essential question is, whether it is too much.

[Mr. HALE, of Maine, when Mr. ELDREDGE had spoken five minutes, obtained the floor, and yielded to enable Mr. ELDREDGE to conclude his remarks. At the conclusion of the second five minutes Mr. HALE, of New York, was recognized.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. I hope the House will allow me to conclude my remarks.

Mr. HURLBUT. I think the gentleman has rather abused the license that was given to him. I object distinctly.

Mr. TREMAIN. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] may be allowed to finish his speech.

Many MEMBERS. Go on.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from Wisconsin to conclude his speech?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I object.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Maine.

The SPEAKER. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I understand that the gentleman from Wisconsin has made a motion by way of amendment to an amendment, and that it is in order to speak against the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin has exhausted, against the rule of the House but by unanimous consent, both sides of the debate. After speaking five minutes in favor of the amendment to the amendment, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] obtained the floor to speak in opposition, and, there being no objection, yielded to allow the gentleman from Wisconsin to continue his remarks.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I promised the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] that I would renew the amendment if he would withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman did renew it; otherwise he would have had nothing to speak upon.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I now withdraw the amendment that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] may renew it.

Mr. HALE, of New York. As a matter of form I renew the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, this debate seems to have taken a somewhat remarkable turn. The comparison of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] who, in his lofty patriotism, likens the call of the public for a repeal of the provision in regard to back pay and increase of salaries to the clamor of the mob for the release of Barabbas is rather far-fetched. According to my friend from Wisconsin, the Roman poet, in describing the patriot, would seem to have had in his view the man who is just and tenacious in regard to his back pay as the one whose elevated mind is above the depraved clamor of the multitude. I do not believe that the better mind of the country or the better mind of this House places in any such category the gentlemen who were instrumental in foisting upon the statute-book the provisions of the act of last March in relation to the increased pay.

The provisions of that law were condemned by popular clamor, if gentlemen choose to call it so; but it was a popular clamor based on sufficient grounds, and commending itself, in my judgment, to the mind of every upright man in this House or out of it. The complaint made against the statute increasing the pay of members of this House was, as I understand, first and last in regard to the amount as being excessive. I believe that the sentiment of the better class of the community was that the amount fixed by that bill was larger than it ought to be, irrespective of every other consideration; and I for one especially believe that it was larger than it ought to be in proportion to the other official salaries paid by the people of this country in the administration of their State and National Governments. But that, as I have said, was the least of the considerations weighing with the people in this matter. The second, and a greater consideration, was that the members of the Forty-second Congress constituted themselves the judges in their own case, increasing at the end of their term their pay for the entire term, and that to an amount which the people believed excessive. The third proposition on which this popular condemnation rested, and, in my judgment, the weightiest of all, relates to the manner in which the act was done. It was not done by square, manly, honest legislation. This House in the Forty-second Congress repeatedly by large majorities voted down the proposition for an increase of their pay when presented as a bold and naked proposition, and then by trick and subterfuge and evasion ingrafted the increase upon a bill on which they could have some excuse for saying, "We vote ourselves increased pay purely as a matter of necessity, because we must do it or defeat the appropriations for the support of the Government." Each and every one of these objections I claim to be well founded, ranking in weight according to the order in which I have stated them.

And, therefore, sir, I am unqualifiedly in favor of the repeal of that bill so far as the salaries of members of both Houses of Congress are concerned, and the return directly to the old compensation, salary, and mileage.

And now one word on mileage. I insist that there is no fairness nor justice in striking out the provision which gives some compensation to members, according to the distance which they have come to attend the sessions of this House, beyond actual expenses incurred. I come from less than the medium or average distance of members of the House—about 500 miles from Washington. I do not hesitate to say most gladly, as a pecuniary question, would I allow to be deducted 40 cents per mile or a dollar per mile from my salary if I could be placed in two hours, four hours, or even ten hours from this House as the members from Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York are. And I do not hesitate to say that an increase of a dollar a mile to my salary would not be any inducement to double or quadruple the distance. The present rate of mileage, 20 cents a mile each way, is, I believe, no more than a just and fair compensation for the greater inconvenience and time spent and sustained by those who reside at the greatest, and beyond the average distance from Washington.

Mr. EAMES. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Forty-second Congress I have no apology to make for my action in the legislation of that Congress in the increase of salaries for members of Congress and other officers of the Government. But as a member of this Congress I enter my protest here and now against any change in the law which does not apply to this Congress from the commencement of the Congress.

If the Forty-second Congress deserves the censure of the country for what it did in increasing the pay of members of Congress, and applying that increase to its own members, then the Forty-third Congress, it seems to me, will justly deserve reproach if, in the attempt to apply a remedy, it allows its members to receive for a period of nine months, when Congress was not in session, the increased pay under the law of March 3, 1873. Whatever pay is agreed upon as just and reasonable ought to take effect from the beginning of this Congress, and I desire to test this question, not by words expressed in debate, but by the votes of the members upon the amendment which has been proposed by the gentleman from Iowa. If $7,500 was an unreasonable compensation for the members of the Forty-second Congress, then it is just as unreasonable for the members of the Forty-third Congress.

But, Mr. Speaker, before considering this question further, I desire to express my own convictions as to what, if anything, ought to be done in changing the existing law. I am not willing to vote upon the bill reported without such expression. A vote either for or against the bill as it now stands will not express my judgment of what ought to be done in the attempt to remedy any unwise legislation of the last Congress upon this delicate and important question of compensation for official services.

In my opinion the bill reported is objectionable not only in what it proposes to do, but especially in what it omits to do. Some of the changes proposed extend beyond anything required by any intelligent expression of the popular will upon this subject, and others of them fall short of any just and reasonable demand for a change in the existing law.

After a somewhat careful consideration of this subject as a guide to my own action and votes, it appears to me that the bill which ought to receive the approval of the House should fix upon a definite sum per annum; that, in addition to this, the actual expense of the Members and Delegates in going to and returning from the seat of Government should be allowed, and that whatever sum is fixed upon as to this Congress, it should apply from the beginning of the Congress. The sum fixed upon should be a fair and reasonable compensation for one who is qualified to discharge properly the laborious and responsible duties of his position as a Member or Delegate in Congress.

It ought to be determined with reference to the office as one of honor as well as of pay, and not solely with reference to either. It should be sufficient in amount to enable any American citizen who is qualified to aspire to the office, and, in accepting it, to be able to act in the discharge of its duties independently and according to his own convictions.

The bill reported, although in some respects it answers these requisites, in others it fails to do what is required, and also does what there is no occasion to do in order to remove any just complaint against the legislation of the last Congress upon this subject.

I cheerfully assent to the doctrine that in this branch of the Federal Government the will of the people, when ascertained, ought not only to be respected but obeyed, but I assert that no such expression of the people requires, as proposed by this act, the absolute and unqualified repeal of the legislation upon this subject of the last Congress.

That some change is demanded is apparent from the general tone of the public press, from the resolutions of State Legislatures, the conventions of both political parties, and above and over all, and by authority, by the people. But what is this complaint, and what is the change demanded?

The complaint is that this increase ought not to have been made at the time and in the manner in which it was made. It is urged that any change in this respect ought to have been made, if at all, in the ordinary course of legislation by a separate bill, and not in a bill providing for the ordinary expenses of the Government, and especially that it should have been operative only from the passage of the act. It is the retroactive feature of the increase that has been the occasion, to a great extent, of the opposition to the increase that was made.

Assenting to the justice of this complaint, and yielding to the demand for a change in the law, the question which we have to consider is, what can and what ought to be done?

The compensation of the President can neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected. The increase of the law of March 3, 1873, in this respect cannot be changed until the 4th of March, 1877; and, if the compensation now fixed by law needs any change, probably our successors may be able to make it as well as we can. The compensation of the judges of the Supreme Court cannot be diminished during their continuance in office. As to either the President or the judges the law is beyond our control, and I am not aware of any well-ascertained expression of the popular will which requires any change in the existing law for these offices. Nor have I been able to ascertain that any intelligent expression of the will of the people requires any change to be made in the compensation fixed by the act of March 3, 1873, for the heads of the Executive Departments, or that of the Vice-President and the Speaker of the House. I believe that no such change is demanded, but that if submitted to the decision of the people they would say that whoever worthily represents this great Republic in these exalted positions will require as compensation the full amount allowed by the recent act of Congress.

The real complaint is against the increase of pay to Members and Delegates in Congress, and especially, if not wholly, against the retroactive clause of the act by which that increase was made. But it is not in the power of Congress to change that law so as to affect the rights acquired thereunder by the members of the Forty-second Congress. The right of Congress to fix by law the compensation of its members is unquestionable. The Constitution imposed upon Congress the duty of determining the compensation of its members for their services. When in the exercise of this undoubted power Congress has by law determined what that compensation shall be, it creates an obligation on the part of the Government which cannot be discharged except by payment, or by consent of the members to relinquish it. The Government might as well refuse to pay any of its bonds as to refuse to pay the compensation of a member of Congress thus ascertained by law. To attempt, either directly or indirectly, to avoid the payment is to repudiate its legal obligations; and although Congress may direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cover all amounts not drawn into the Treasury, such action will not release the Government from its legal obligations in this respect. I speak of this question merely in its legal aspects.

There is, then, only this that can and ought to be done upon this subject, namely, to fix a reasonable compensation for the services of a member of Congress.

The bill reported proposes to do so, naming a sum equal to that before the law was changed, but it repeats the error of the last Congress in allowing to the members of this Congress the increased pay as fixed by the last Congress. In this it fails to remedy the evil of which complaint is made.

If the salary, as increased, is too large for the Forty-second Congress, it is too large for the Forty-third Congress. If it is unreasonable for the members of the Forty-second Congress during the entire Congress, it is for the same reason unreasonable for any part of the time of the Forty-third Congress.

The complaint is that this increased compensation is unreasonable, and the last Congress has been blamed for the increase, and condemned for receiving it. This increase was made for a Congress in which there were three sessions, and after the services had been rendered, and the amount received was about forty-five hundred dollars for a period of two years. This bill proposes to pay the members of this Congress about two thousand dollars, over the salary fixed by law before the change, for a period of nine months, during which no public service had been rendered, and before, in fact, the House had been organized or the Congress was in being.

It is said to be wrong for the members of the Forty-second Congress to have received pay at the increased rate, but that it is right for the members of the Forty-third Congress to receive it. It is wrong for me to receive it as a member of the Forty-second Congress after the services have been rendered, but right for me to receive it as a member of the Forty-third Congress before any service has been rendered. And the reason given is that members of this Congress did not pass the law. It was received by members of the Forty-second Congress because it was the compensation to which they were entitled as ascertained by law; and if received by members of the Forty-third Congress it is only because such is the compensation prescribed by law. The only difference is that the Forty-second Congress received it after the services were rendered, and the Forty-third Congress, under a special provision of the law, for nine months before they had entered upon the discharge of their public duties.

If, then, the Forty-second Congress are justly open to rebuke for receiving this increased compensation, what may be truthfully said of the Forty-third Congress, who, fresh from the people, under instructions to repeal the law absolutely and unconditionally, avail themselves of the law to obtain the increased pay, when they admit that they have the power to establish a less compensation, commencing with the present Congress?

It would be better to have left the law as it is than to attempt so lame and impotent a remedy as is proposed by the bill reported.

I hope the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] will meet with the approval of the House.

Mr. KASSON. I call for the previous question on the pending amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire what is the necessity for calling the previous question on the pending amendments?

The SPEAKER. If the House, as in Committee of the Whole, desires the vote on any question, it can only do it by enforcing the demand for the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. Gentlemen are entitled to a speech, one on each side, and no more. On the pending amendment debate has been exhausted, and the previous question can do no more than what has been already accomplished. Gentlemen cannot make speeches when they are not entitled to make them.

The SPEAKER. So long as an amendment can be added to an amendment, the amendment in the first degree can never be voted on unless on the demand for the previous question. The demand of the gentleman from Iowa brings the House, if the demand be seconded, to a vote, first on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] and then on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa himself.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the gentleman from Iowa wish to cut off all other amendments?

The SPEAKER. It affects no other amendment, but brings the House to vote directly on the pending amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The amendments were again read.

Mr. HURLBUT. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment, and will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to offer an amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have an amendment to offer.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts to offer his amendment?

Mr. KASSON. Not unless it is pertinent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is directly pertinent.

Mr. KASSON. I will hear it read for information.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That the members of this Congress who were members of any preceding Congress, and who received back pay under the act passed at that Congress, shall have the amount of such back pay deducted from the amount due them from this Congress.

[Applause and laughter on both sides of the House.]

Mr. KASSON. I decline to admit that amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope the House will vote down the demand for the previous question so that I may offer the amendment.

Mr. KASSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KASSON, and Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts, were appointed.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman state——

The SPEAKER. It is for the tellers to count and for the Chair to state. [Laughter.] The gentleman demands the previous question on his amendment, and the effect will be, if seconded, to bring the House to a vote on that amendment, and that only. Then the previous question will be exhausted, and the bill will be left still open to amendment as though that amendment had not been passed upon.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the previous question is not sustained, then the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be in order.

The SPEAKER. Of course.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes not counted.

So the House refused to second the previous question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now move my amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That the members of this Congress who were members of any preceding Congress, and who received back pay under the acts passed at that Congress, shall have the amount of such back pay deducted from the amount due them from this Congress.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I demand the previous question on the two amendments.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 122, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Is the amendment debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not, as the previous question is operating.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry: Whether the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts is offered as an addition to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa?

The SPEAKER. It is. The proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts is an addition, in the nature of an amendment, to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, and Mr. LEACH moved that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending the roll-call, it is moved by two gentlemen that the House do now adjourn.

The question being put on the motion to adjourn, it was declared by the Chair, on the vote by sound, that the noes had it.

Several MEMBERS. Count the House.

Mr. WOODFORD. We may as well have the yeas and nays. Let us bring them right to the record upon this thing.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 84, noes 121.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, asked for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE, of Maine, and Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the result of the vote by tellers was announced by the Chair as ayes 113, noes 113.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes "no."

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. There has been a mistake in the count, as reported to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker's clerk handed to the Chair the figures, and he is generally very accurate in taking the numbers announced by the tellers. The tellers left their places rather precipitately.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I did not keep the count toward the last of it. The easiest way will be to have the yeas and nays, and I ask for them.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KASSON. I hope it will be a test vote as to the repeal of the law.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 77, nays 183, not voting 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Barry, Beck, Biery, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cessna, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Cook, Crocker, Crossland, Crounse, Darrall, Davis, Durham, Eldredge, Elliott, Glover, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Hays, Herndon, Houghton, Hunton, Hynes, Kendall, Leach, Lofland, Lowndes, Lynch, Maynard, McJunkin, Milliken, Morey, Nesmith, Niblack, Niles, Nunn, Page, Isaac C. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodford, and Woodworth—183.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banning, Bland, Freeman Clarke, Crooke, Field, Hersey, Hooper, Lamar, Lamison, Lansing, McKee, Mitchell, Phelps, James H. Platt, jr., Poland, Randall, James C. Robinson, Sheats, Stephens, St. John, Sypher, Thomas, Vance, Jasper D. Ward, and Ephraim K. Wilson—25.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask that that amendment be read. I believe it has been for the purpose of weighting down the bill, and I want a test vote on that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I deny that entirely.

The amendment of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, was again read.

Mr. LEACH. I ask that both amendments may be read.

The SPEAKER. The amendment to which that just read is an amendment will be again reported.

The amendment of Mr. KASSON was again read.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. I have no doubt that the members of Congress are competent to vote on a bill fixing their salaries. But I wish to raise this question: whether those who have received their salaries under former laws are so interested as to be prohibited from voting on the pending question. I know that there are several gentlemen here who have received their pay under former acts of Congress; and I think the question now presented is a very different one from that of fixing their salaries in the first instance.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask that the twenty-ninth rule of the House be read.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I am one of those who would not wish to vote in violation of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The twenty-ninth rule of the House will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No member shall vote on any question in the event of which he is immediately or particularly interested.

The SPEAKER. What point does the gentleman from Massachusetts make, and against whom? The Chair does not rule upon abstract points. If the point be made on any gentleman the Chair will rule upon it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then I make the point on my colleague from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUFFINTON,] who was fortunate enough to be early here and has received back salary, as he ought to have done.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I make the point upon myself. I was here and voted for the salary law of 1866.

The SPEAKER. So far as the gentleman's own vote is concerned in a House so full as this, he will not be called upon to vote unless he chooses to do so. As to the point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] on his colleague, [Mr. BUFFINTON,] the Chair overrules it. The Chair does not see in what respect the gentleman is interested in this question any more than the whole House is interested in it. The interest referred to in the rule must be an interest distinct from the public interest. The gentleman from Massachusetts only states a case in which the interest of one member is distinct from the interest of another member.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Distinct from the public interest.

The SPEAKER. Not at all; it is a case in which the interest of one member is different from that of another. The Chair overrules the point of order because there is nothing in it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The Constitution makes it our duty to fix our own pay.

The SPEAKER. But it does not require that the gentleman shall fix it any more than it requires his colleague.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He may fix his own pay.

The SPEAKER. That does not give the gentleman a right to fix another member's pay without his having a say in the matter. If the point of order were sustained, the gentleman from Massachusetts would arrogate to himself the right not only to fix his own pay, but to fix the pay of his colleagues.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By no means; I should not think of voting on a question in which I was interested.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sees no distinction between the case raised and the case of members generally. The point of order is overruled, and the question recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have already been ordered upon this question.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the vote is taken upon this question, I desire to say that inasmuch as this amendment would affect me personally, I do not feel at liberty to vote upon it, and ask to be excused.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen are at liberty not to vote if they prefer not to do so; the Chair hears no objection.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 121, nays 129, not voting 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Arthur, Averill, Barber, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bowen, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Ashe, Atkins, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Blount, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burchard, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Corwin, Cotton, Crittenden, Crossland, Curtis, Danford, Dawes, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Williams, William B. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Woodford, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—129.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banning, Barrere, Bland, Freeman Clarke, Creamer, Crooke, Eldredge, Field, Hersey, Hooper, Hurlbut, Kendall, Lamar, Lamison, Lamport, Lawrence, Maynard, McKee, Mitchell, Morey, Phelps, James H. Platt, jr., Poland, Randall, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Sawyer, Scofield, Sheats, Sloss, Smart, Stephens, St. John, Thomas, and Wilber—35.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. O, no; let's stay here and finish the bill.

The question was put on Mr. NEGLEY's motion; and, on a division, there were—ayes 137, noes 85.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 114, nays 134, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Barber, Barree, Barry, Bass, Beck, Biery Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Roderick R. NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Arthur, Barnum, Bell, Berry, Blount, Bowen,

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banning, Begole, Bland, John B. Clark, jr., Stephen A. Cobb, Creamer, Crittenden, Crooke, Farwell, Field, Gooch, Hersey, Hooper, Howe, Kendall, Lamar, Lamison, Lamport, McKee, Mitchell, Morey, Nunn, Parsons, Phelps, James H. Platt, jr., Poland, Randall, James C. Robinson, Sheats, Sloss, William A. Smith, Southard, Stephens, St. John, Thomas, Walls, and Ephraim K. Wilson—37.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment I offered was lost.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman vote with the prevailing side?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not think I did.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman cannot make that motion.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Upon the appeal of many members, who have been voting in the same direction I have, and as this matter will come up the first thing after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning, I move that the House now adjourn.

Many MEMBERS. O, no.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order, a similar motion having just been voted down. The question now is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. COBURN, and Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts, called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LEACH. Pending the call for the yeas and nays I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and others. O, no.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The yeas and nays were then ordered on the amendment moved by Mr. KASSON.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 172, nays 76, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Beck, Berry, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. HAYS. And on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SENER. Pending the call for the yeas and nays, I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to upon a division—ayes 142, noes 46; and accordingly (at six o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented, under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. ATKINS: Two petitions from sundry citizens of the seventh congressional district of Tennessee, praying for the passage of a bill for the relief of the Southern Methodist publishing house at Nashville, Tennessee.

Also, a petition of citizens of Marshall, Grundy, and Tama Counties, Iowa, praying for the establishment of a post-route from Traer, via Crystal and Badger Hill, Tama County, and Wadaloup, Grundy County, to Liscomb, Marshall County.

By Mr. WOLFE: A petition of sundry citizens of Washington County, Indiana, praying for an increase in the currency, by providing for the deposit of Government bonds, &c.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 17, 1873.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of citizens of South Washington, praying to be protected against a nuisance created and maintained by the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of citizens of Sedgwick County, Kansas, praying Congress to pass a law granting them relief in the purchase of certain lands in Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented the memorial of William J. McDonald, praying compensation for damage done to his property in consequence of an act of Congress changing the grade of the streets upon which his property is located; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SCOTT. I present the resolutions, in the nature of a memorial, passed by the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, calling attention to the suggestions made by the National Board of Trade, and recommending in those suggestions modifications of the bankrupt law. I move their reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Luise von Püchelstein, widow of Major von Püchelstein, praying to be placed on the pension roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the memorial of citizens of Portland, Oregon, merchants, shippers, importers, &c., protesting against the repeal of an act approved June 7, 1872, providing for the protection, engagement, and discharge of seamen shipped upon American merchant vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WINDOM presented a petition of citizens of Minnesota, praying for an extension of time for the payment of their lands on the Fort Ridgely reservation in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present the petition of Charlotte D. Crocker, widow of the late Brigadier-General Marcellus M. Crocker, of Iowa, indorsed by the governor of our State and the adjutant-general of the State, praying for an increase of pension; and which petition, together with the papers heretofore on the files in the same case, I move be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I also present the memorial of James T. Powell, Davis Baker, and George Gross, a committee representing several temperance organizations in the city of Washington, asking an appropriation for the purpose of erecting a suitable building in this District to be used as a hospital for the care of inebriates, together with some other matters that are set forth in the memorial; and at the request of the memorialists I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of Rufus Meade, United States consul at San Juan del Sur, praying compensation for performing the duties of minister at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PRATT presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Indiana, in favor of an appropriation by Congress for the improvement of the harbor at Michigan City, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT. I move that the joint resolution of the Legislature of Indiana which I presented yesterday morning be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SPENCER presented additional papers in the case of John P. Kelsey, asking a repayment of moneys disbursed by him in the execution of an order made by Brigadier-General E. B. Brown for the protection of certain interests of the United States in the State of Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask that an order be made to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in the case of Annie M. Roblas Robaldo that they may be referred to the committee having the case in charge in the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Nathaniel J. Beachley, praying for pay as United States surgeon and for repayment of moneys expended in Government service in 1864, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Gallus Kerchner be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SPRAGUE, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers of H. H. Lloyd be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, it was Ordered, That Robert Tillson have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CRAGIN. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 480) to provide for enlistments in the Navy, have had the same under consideration and have unanimously instructed me to report it back without amendment and to ask for its passage; and as it is of importance that this bill should be passed at once, as it simply provides for an increase of 1,500 seamen in the Navy in consequence of the present emergency, I hope there will be no objection to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DAVIS. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to considering that bill at any time, but I am opposed to its passage, and shall deem it my duty to resist it as long as I can. Whenever the subject comes up I shall debate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I think it had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the bill is objected to, and it will lie over.

Mr. SCOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims to report back the petition of Antoinette Darling, praying compensation for damages sustained in consequence of Indian depredations in Minnesota, with the recommendation that it ought not to be allowed; and I ask the adoption of that report at this time.

Mr. RAMSEY. Will not the Senator allow it to lie over until to-morrow?

Mr. SCOTT. I will state briefly the reason why I ask the adoption of the report, and I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota, as it does not relate simply to this petition. The petition upon which I have reported was presented in the Fortieth Congress, and it has been presented in every Congress since. It has traveled around from the Committee on Indian Affairs to the Committee on Appropriations; from the Committee on Appropriations to the Committee on Indian Affairs again, and from that committee to the Committee on Claims, until at the last session there was an adverse report upon it from the Committee on Claims. Under the forty-ninth rule of the Senate, where an adverse report is made and adopted the same case and papers cannot be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to a committee unless a petition is presented setting forth that new evidence will be adduced to sustain the claim. This case, although adversely reported upon, was suffered to go by and the report not adopted; and thus a case which has frequently been considered, and which has been adversely reported upon, is again brought up, and a member of the Committee on Claims is compelled to go over it again.

I wish now to state that, wherever I find that to be the case, with the concurrence of the committee we will report it back and ask the adoption of the report, so that this incessant labor of going over a case time after time may be avoided. This is one of those cases, and I hope the Senate will adopt the report, so that when any member shall rise again and ask to have it referred, unless there is additional evidence, we can enforce the forty-ninth rule, and save ourselves a great deal of unnecessary labor.

Mr. RAMSEY. Will the Senator tell me what the case is?

Mr. SCOTT. The name of the petitioner is Antoinette Darling, and she claims compensation for injuries suffered from depredations by the Indians in Minnesota in 1862. All those claimants had the opportunity of going before a board of commissioners organized for the purpose of examining their claims, and which reported upon them. They permitted that opportunity to go by. This case was not heard, and the claimant now asks a direct appropriation out of the Treasury, whereas others who were heard were paid out of the annuities of the Indians who committed the depredations, which were retained for that purpose.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will say to the Senator that all the parties damaged by the Indians had not an opportunity of appearing before that commission. Many of them were so injured, their property destroyed, their families so scattered, that many fled to eastern cities; and some Germans especially (and many of the settlers on that frontier were Germans and Scandinavians) had no information, not reading English papers, that such a commission had been ordered by Congress or was in session. I know another case in which the party was situated in that way; he had no knowledge of it, and the Indian Committee has made a favorable report in his case under those circumstances. Hence it is not fair to conclude that in every instance the party had an opportunity to appear. Many had not for the reason I have mentioned; and it is quite improper to take this course in regard to this petition merely because it comes in this way. I hope the committee will not conclude to report invariably adversely to all these claims.

Mr. SCOTT. In answer to that statement I have to say that if the claim is now favorably reported on it can only be paid by a direct appropriation out of the Treasury. If it is paid at all it ought to be paid by the Indians out of the annuities of the tribe that committed the depredation. If it were proper to pay it out of the annuities, the subject has been three times before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and they have not acted upon it. So far, then, as the committee to which it is now referred is concerned, they wish to be entirely rid of it.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think it would be proper to pay these damages, inasmuch as the other fund has been exhausted, out of the annuities of the Indians; but would not the proper course of the Senator then be to refer the case to the Committee on Indian Affairs, who have claims of that kind under consideration now?

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the adoption of the adverse report of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RAMSEY. Suppose the matter is allowed to lie on the table until to-morrow morning?

Mr. SCOTT. I am only glad that the Senator from Minnesota has risen to combat this proposition, for it is one which I think is of very great importance, not simply to the committee from which this report comes, but to all the committees of the body. It is intended to arrest this business of coming in at the commencement of the session and asking to have referred again to a committee papers which have been acted upon adversely; and simply because the report was not adopted when it was made it is not within that rule which would prevent it from being referred. I wish now to adopt this adverse report, so that when the motion shall be made to refer this petition again it cannot be referred unless the petitioner comes in and states that there is additional evidence to be acted on.

Mr. RAMSEY. How does this matter come before the committee at this time? By a reference again?

Mr. SCOTT. It comes before the committee this time by the Senator from Minnesota introducing it, and having it referred to the Committee on Claims. The Committee on Claims have considered it, and they have reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the adverse report.

The report was adopted.

Mr. SCOTT. I report also from the same committee the petition of Frank C. Darling, and make the same report, that it ought not to be allowed, and move that the report be adopted for the same reason.

The report was adopted.

Mr. BOREMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of F. W. E. Lohman, Samuel Ruth, and S. M. Carter, asking compensation for secret service during the war, to report it back adversely and to state that there is not a particle of legal evidence in the case; and the committee give notice that unless there is evidence to support these cases they will report in the same way.

The report was adopted.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 59) granting relief to Eva, Etta, Henry, and Guy Carleton, heirs of General James H. Carleton, deceased, reported it with an amendment.

PUBLICATION OF NAMES OF ABSENTEES.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am directed by the Committee on Rules, to whom was referred a resolution relative to omitting the names of absentees in the reports of our debates, to report it back favorably and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution adopted by the Senate on the 4th of May, 1864, directing the reporter in making up the proceedings of the Senate for publication to put in a separate list the names of absentees in each call of the yeas and nays, be rescinded.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I think there can be no objection to the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it had better go over.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope it will not be passed now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

G. W. STANDEFER.

Mr. AMES. I am instructed by the Committee on Enrolled Bills, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 482) to correct the enrollment of an act entitled "An act for the relief of P. W. Standefer," to report the same back and ask for its present consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I feel inclined to object to the present consideration of the bill, not out of any opposition to it, but because I am desirous to reach the order of business which will enable us in the morning hour to take up the bankrupt bill which came from the House, and to dispose of it, either by sending it to a committee or in some other way. I think it ought to be sent to a committee. I do not object to this bill, however, because I understand it merely provides for a change of a letter in a law, a matter of form; but I mention it as entering a caveat against taking up the morning hour with business just reported.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 482) to correct the enrollment of an act entitled "An act for the relief of P. W. Standefer."

It proposes to amend the act approved on the 3d day of March, 1873, entitled "An act for the relief of P. W. Standefer," by striking out of the act, where it occurs, and from the title thereto, the name of "P. W. Standefer," and inserting the name of "G. W. Standefer."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print five hundred extra copies of the report of the Librarian of Congress for the use of the librarian, have instructed me to report back the same without amendment and recommend its passage.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That five hundred additional copies of the annual report of the Librarian of Congress for the year ending December 1, 1873, be printed, with paper covers, for the use of the librarian.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BOGY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 204) for the relief of Robert Bent and Jack Smith; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BOGY. I am authorized by the Committee on Indian Affairs to ask for the passage of the bill, and also to say a few words on the subject.

This is a bill for the relief of two persons whose names are mentioned in it—Robert Bent and Jack Smith. These two persons are entitled each to 640 acres of land given to them by a treaty made with the Arapaho and Cheyenne Indians in 1861, and the matter has remained in abeyance from that day to this. The treaty made with those Indians in 1861 was ratified by the Senate, and these persons were justly entitled to this land. The Secretary of the Interior decided that it was not competent for him to make a title to the lands, so given to these individuals by the treaty, without an act of Congress authorizing the passage of the title; and this bill is only carrying out the provisions of the treaty made in 1861.

While upon this subject, Mr. President, I will say that this very fact shows the bad organization of the Indian Bureau and the whole system of Indian legislation. The treaty by which these persons were entitled to this land was made upward of twelve years ago and ratified by the Senate, and these persons were justly and fairly entitled to their land immediately; and yet for twelve years have they been asking for it, and without being positively refused, the matter has been neglected for the want of proper authority somewhere.

I am a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I will, during this session of Congress, prepare a bill to reorganize the whole Indian Bureau, and, indeed, to take the Indian Bureau from where it is now and place it in the hands of the military department of the Government; for I do say, and I wish Senators to hear me, that a greater farce does not exist in any enlightened country than our system of Indian legislation at the present day. There is no head, there is no responsibility, there is no concentration, there is no power anywhere to do any good, but infinite power to do mischief.

All the troubles upon our western frontier, all the murders, all the depredations, are committed because of the want of proper and wise legislation on this subject. It is true the Indian commits murder, and is very often apparently the aggressor. He is the aggressor because wrongs have been continually perpetrated against him, not because the Government desires to do him wrong. I am perfectly satisfied that the wish, the intent, of the whole nation is to do him more than justice; but the system is so defective that justice cannot be done.

As a mere illustration: you have a Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs is presumed in law to be the head of the Indian Bureau, and yet the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is merely a clerk of the Secretary of the Interior, and has no power whatever. In addition to this you have Indian commissioners appointed by the President. I believe they are not even confirmed by the Senate; but they are appointed by the President, and it is their right to pass upon all Indian contracts, to reject or to approve, doing away with the power both of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and of the Secretary of the Interior. There are five of these irresponsible commissioners. They may be very worthy men. I know one in my own city, Colonel Campbell, and a better man could not be found in the country for the position, but I doubt if he be not the only one who is really fit for the position. If there are others I do not know them.

But, in addition to this, you have five inspectors at a salary of some three thousand dollars a year, with ten cents per mile for travel, whose duty it is to visit every agency in the United States, from the Mississippi to Alaska, and who are allowed to charge ten cents a mile for travel, with a power to remove every Indian agent, with a power to stop all contracts—with an absolute power; and they report their action and their doings to the President of the United States, doing away with the power of the Secretary of the Interior, with the power of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and with the power of the five commissioners.

In addition to this you have superintendents of Indian affairs whose powers are so great and so indefinite that they are in constant conflict with these five inspectors, and one will not yield to the other.

Besides all this you have Indian agents who claim that they are acting under the law too, and they cannot be interfered with; and in this way you have a system that is complete chaos, complete confusion, and there is no responsibility anywhere.

Again, sir, the Indian is in contact with the United States at this day merely, if I may so express it, in a military aspect. He is so pursued, so narrowed down in his dimensions, that he is continually in conflict with the white man. The interposition of the Army is required. From a pretty good knowledge of the subject, having once had—I may say—the misfortune of being Commissioner of Indian Affairs—for while I held it I had a great deal of trouble and was continually persecuted for holding it because I tried to do my duty, and my residence on the frontier has also given me the opportunity of knowing much about the Indians—I say, and I wish the Senate to hear it, that the whole system is a farce—is an outrage; and I believe I shall get the co-operation of the gentlemen who represent the Western States west of the Mississippi River, who agree with me on this subject. I will consult with Senators from the extreme West on that matter, and see if something cannot be done to reduce the present heterogeneous system to some order, and get unity and concentration of power somewhere.

With regard to this bill, Mr. President, there is no question but that it should be passed. The committee is unanimous. These men are justly entitled to this land. It has been surveyed by the Government of the United States, the survey designated, and the title has been withheld for the want of positive legislation enabling the Secretary of the Interior to issue the patent. I hope the bill will be put upon its passage.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask him if the bill has been referred by the Senate to the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. BOGY. It has been considered by the committee.

Mr. SARGENT. Is there any letter of the Secretary of the Interior on this case?

Mr. BOGY. There was before the committee.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to have the letter read or the bill laid over until to-morrow, until I can examine it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to have an opportunity to examine the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 205) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to discharge certain obligations of the United States to the creditors of the upper and lower bands of Sioux Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 206) to provide for the publication of certain maps of survey of the Upper Mississippi and Minnesota Rivers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 207) for the relief of C. E. Rogers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 208) to reimburse the State of West Virginia for losses incurred by reason of the destruction of its bridges, court-houses, school-houses, churches, turnpike-roads, and other public property by Federal troops during the late war; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LEWIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 209) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 210) to return to William B. Isaacs & Co., of Richmond, Virginia, certain coin covered into the Treasury of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 211) to amend the charter of the Columbia Railway Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 212) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use, for the removal of the Kickapoo Indians and other Indians on the borders of Texas and Mexico, to the Indian Territory, and for their support after such removal, the unexpended balance of appropriations made for the above purpose by acts approved July 15, 1870, and March 3, 1871; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 213) providing for the printing of the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1872 and the year 1873; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 214) for the relief of Robert Coles; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 215) in relation to the printing of the Biennial Register, commonly called the Blue Book; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPEAL OF THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, in order that the bill may be read a second time to-day, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 792, to repeal the bankrupt act.

Mr. SUMNER. I object to that until we get through with the morning business.

Mr. THURMAN. I only ask that the bill may be read a second time; it will take but a moment.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; that can be attended to when we get through with the morning business. I have a resolution to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts objects. Resolutions are now in order.

CHARGES OF INTEREST BY NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. PRATT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to report whether more efficient provisions of law are not required to restrain the national banks from charging, reserving, and taking a higher rate of interest than is allowed by law to be taken.

COLLECTION OF INTERNAL REVENUE BY STAMPS.

Mr. SUMNER. I send to the Chair a resolution which I ask to have read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to consider the expediency of reducing the national expenditure by abolishing the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue and other offices under him, and forthwith providing by law for the collection of all internal taxes by the sale and use of stamps, the presence of stamps on articles being evidence that they had paid the tax, and the absence of stamps that they had not paid the tax, and taxed articles without stamps being seizable by any officer and forfeitable in any United States court, the law to be administered by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the committee shall consider the extent of saving and economy by such change.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there is to be no debate upon it I do not object; if there is, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not wish to debate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 478) to provide for the redemption of the loan of 1858.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 614) to so amend the laws relative to internal revenue as to allow distillery houses to be continued in use after changes have occurred in the management of the business; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PENSIONS TO DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the existing pension laws as to provide that the allowance or monthly pension granted to soldiers who have lost an arm above the elbow shall be the same as that now allowed to soldiers who have lost a leg above the knee, and report by bill or otherwise.

REPEAL OF THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the time is going on, I move to postpone the present and all prior orders and take up the bankrupt bill. Let us see if we cannot determine whether it shall be referred or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the motion made by the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears none, and the bill will be read the second time.

The bill (H. R. No. 792) to repeal an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws or parts of laws amendatory thereto, was read the second time by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that this bill be referred in the usual way to the Committee on the Judiciary. I know there is an earnest desire in some parts of the country—and a sincere one and one based upon some grievances which I can see clearly—that this bill should pass as it is and be a total repeal of the existing law. But I am satisfied myself (though I am not going to make a speech about it) that there will be infinite injury with danger to the country in its financial condition with a total and absolute repeal. I am satisfied that if the subject can be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary we shall be able, with a considerable if not an entire degree of unanimity, to report a bill which will relieve the present law of the obnoxious feature that it now is said to contain and which to an extent I believe it does contain, by which oppression is practiced, and still leave the debtor class and the creditor class the means of justice and equality in commercial enterprises and in commercial securities, and to take it out of the power of any one man or any one party of men to do wrong upon either side, either in cheating creditors or oppressing debtors.

With that view, I hope there will be no objection on the part of Senators who now think there should be a total repeal, but who I feel sure I could convince, if I had the health and the time, that it would be better to modify the law and to modify it so as to affect even present proceedings in respect to composition deeds and other things of that kind, to letting it go to the committee without pressing a debate on its passage now.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the only doubt I have about the motion of the honorable Senator from Vermont depends upon the question whether we are most certain to act on this subject before the holiday recess with or without a reference to the committee. The House bill has now been read twice; if it lies on the table it is always within the power of the Senate. The Committee on the Judiciary has before it already not only the subject of the bankruptcy act, but several bills which constitute adequate foundation for any report the committee may make. These bills have also been read a first and second time, and are therefore as far advanced as the pending bill will be should it be reported back by the committee, except that this bill has already received the favorable action of the House of Representatives. Should we amend it—should the committee propose to amend it, and the Senate ratify the action of the committee—it must go back to the House with no better opportunity of becoming a law than either of the other bills to which I refer, now in the custody of the committee, should they be moved as amendments to the House bill.

Therefore, Mr. President, I suggest a question for the consideration of Senators: the Committee on the Judiciary having already jurisdiction of the subject; having, besides the power of every committee itself to originate a bill, several bills which have already been read twice, will it not be better, in the opinion of those who think as I think, that early action should be taken on the subject, to allow the House bill to lie on the table, allowing the Committee on the Judiciary to make any report which that committee may make in season for action by the two Houses before the holidays, and thus reserve a double probability of action upon this question? I suggest this course for the consideration of the Senate and of the honorable Senator from Vermont.

Being on my feet, I wish to add another remark. That the bankrupt act as it now stands, with its onerous fees, its unusual methods of proceeding—methods with which the bar and the bench and the commercial community in the States are not contented—with the opportunity it gives to a single creditor, or to a few creditors, to control the interests of the rest, ought to be repealed or essentially and radically modified, I cannot doubt. Such is the judgment of the business community, of the bar, of the bench, in those localities with which I am most familiar.

At the last session of Congress the House of Representatives, being composed in large part of persons different from those now there, adopted by a large majority a repealing act. The present House has done the same thing. Such is the bill before us. It contains but two sections, the first repealing entirely the bankruptcy act and all supplemental acts; the second section containing but two provisions, first, a reservation as to certain pending proceedings; and, second, a provision that in such pending proceedings the costs shall be only half the costs now allowed by law. Thus the House has acted.

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. BOGY. The question is pertinent to his argument. It is this: Does the second section of the bill which has passed the House enable proceedings to be continued to a final determination that are now pending, or does it only enable those proceedings to be continued in such cases where the parties have already been adjudicated bankrupts? There is a very great difference between the two things. Proceedings may be instituted, and have to be instituted, before the party is adjudicated a bankrupt.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator is quite right; and my statement needs correction if it implied that in all cases whatever of pending proceedings a reservation is made. The section is so brief that perhaps I had better read it:

SEC. 2. That all suits and proceedings now pending in the courts of the United States wherein an adjudication for bankruptcy has been made shall be proceeded with and governed by the provisions of existing laws, which are hereby continued in force only for the purpose of closing up suits and proceedings now pending: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act, the fees, commissions, and charges of the officers and agents of the courts in bankruptcy cases shall be reduced to one-half of the fees, commissions, and charges heretofore allowed.

Mr. BOGY. I wish to ask the Senator, he having the reputation of being a good lawyer, this further question: whether, under the bill passed by the House, proceedings in bankruptcy where the party has not yet been adjudged bankrupt would not, by the operation of this law, necessarily terminate, and the parties be restored to their rights as if no bankrupt law had ever existed?

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the Senator to be right, and I did not intend to convey a different impression. I will not consume the time, as I am reminded that the morning hour has almost expired. I hope, however, before this bill is referred to the committee, the matter will be considered by Senators who believe, as I believe, that we ought, before the holiday recess, which threatens to commence on Friday, to do something with the bankrupt law. Suppose the Judiciary Committee shall be able to report back to-morrow; that will be Thursday; we may adjourn on Friday; a single objection will prevent the consideration of the report from the committee to-morrow; thus we may be thrown over until Friday. Is it likely that we can by this method take up and discuss this question, and send the bill back to the House and get action there? I do not answer the question; I ask it; only saying that my impression is that we are safer with the bill on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask my friend a question in regard to this point of expedition. I ask whether if this bill can be amended, as undoubtedly it can, to meet the wishes of a majority of the Senate—and I should say almost all, because I think I understand my friend's views pretty well on the general subject—it would not be much easier to have it disposed of in the House of Representatives on an amendment proposed between the two Houses to this bill than it would on an independent bill sent by us over there?

Mr. CONKLING. I am inclined to think the Senator is right in that. There is a good answer to his suggestion, however. If the Judiciary Committee shall report amendments commanding the assent of a majority of the Senate, nothing can be easier, with the bill lying on the table, when it is taken up, than to ingraft these amendments upon it; whereas if it should turn out that the Judiciary Committee shall make no report, or none satisfactory to the Senate, then this bill lying on the table keeps it constantly in the hands of a majority of the body to take it up and act upon it whenever the majority shall please.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I rose at the same time with the Senator from New York to say substantially what he has said. Therefore I shall not repeat what he has said. I am very anxious that this subject shall be acted upon before the recess. I believe the best way is, the bill having been read the second time, to let it lie on the table, and if the Judiciary Committee propose amendments to the bankrupt act, let them be moved as amendments to this bill and let us send it back to the House for the concurrence of the House in those amendments. I hope, therefore, that the bill will be left on the table, instead of being referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I would suggest an amendment to the motion of reference to the Judiciary Committee, and that is that the bill be referred to the Judiciary Committee with a request that they report to-day, and that they have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate. I am opposed to having that bill lie upon the table for this reason: That bill is a total repeal of the bankrupt law. Every bankrupt law (and we have had three in this country) has been adopted during a time of financial disaster for the relief of debtors; and now, when we are suffering under financial disaster, we propose reversing all history and repealing the bankrupt law because there are defects in it, defects which are familiar to each one of us. The expenses are too great; preferences may be destroyed by subsequent bankruptcy; too few creditors can throw a man into bankruptcy—these are the defects. We all agree in reference to these subjects, and if the Committee on the Judiciary is instructed to report on this bill either to-day or to-morrow, there will be no trouble in passing a law curing all the defects at the present session of Congress.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President——

SPECIE PAYMENTS—THE CURRENCY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us finish this matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that going over informally until this matter is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York [Mr. FENTON] is entitled to the floor on the resolution. Does he object?

Mr. FENTON. I think I had better retain the floor. I am not quite clear in reference to these conflicting propositions, and should be glad to consider them a little more myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York objects. The Senator from New York has the floor on the resolution before the Senate.

Mr. FENTON. I ask the Secretary to read the resolution reported by the chairman of the Finance Committee and also the resolution reported by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] from the minority of the committee.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution reported by Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress during its present session to adopt definite measures to redeem the pledge made in the act approved March 18, 1869, entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," as follows:

"And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin."

And the Committee on Finance is directed to report to the Senate at as early a day as practicable such measures as will not only redeem this pledge of the public faith, but will also furnish a currency of uniform value, always redeemable in gold or its equivalent, and so adjusted as to meet the changing wants of trade and commerce.

The resolution submitted by Mr. BAYARD, from the minority of the committee, is as follows:

Whereas a just regard for the interests of every class of the community demands that the national basis of finance shall consist of a currency of uniform standard and intrinsic value: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, instructed to report to the Senate measures which will secure at the earliest practicable day a return to specie payments.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. President, it will be seen that the resolutions do not suggest any definite plan, so I will address myself to the general principle which they present. I do not, therefore, propose a panacea for present financial disorder, but rather I would be glad to take a step in the direction of improvement. I do not doubt that timely application would have in a great degree, if not wholly, averted the existing derangement. But that is past, and it is the part of statesmanship to create a healthy condition by careful and well-considered remedies. The financial problem is one of wide scope. It embraces the questions of debt and taxation, of banking and currency, which are in a great measure bound up together. No system can work a final and complete restoration which does not deal with all these parts. Each in their turn is more or less intimately associated with the industry and commerce of the country, the standard of value, and the rise and fall of prices.

Especially is the currency closely connected with all the varied interests of our daily affairs. In the exchanges of trade—in the work of production—in the compensations of labor, and in every business transaction it enters as a principal agent. The evils of its present depreciated and inconvertible character are apparent. I wish I could congratulate the country upon having made progress toward a better currency. Since the close of the war there has been ample time for a long step in stability, security, and confidence. To be sure, the public debt has been diminished, and all doubt of its ultimate payment is removed. The process of refunding has been carried to a point, sometimes by extraordinary methods, which shows progress. The public credit abroad has been at times somewhat improved. The taxes have been reduced and, in so far as they bore directly upon our domestic interests, with due regard to our circumstances. On the other hand the expenditures of the Government have not been retrenched with a firm and unsparing hand, nor thus far with any perceptible advantage to the country. Official duties have not been at all times discharged with economy, zeal, and integrity. So whatever improvement we note is mainly owing to the fortunate state of our national growth and elastic vigor. Wise management has done very little for us, but favorable natural conditions and irrepressible vitality have saved us from frequent disheartening revulsions.

While it is true that no nation ever emerged from a gigantic and prolonged conflict and resumed the career of peace with so little distress, it must be borne in mind that no other nation has been so favorably circumstanced. England, wiser than ourselves in some respects, came out of the long and arduous struggle at the beginning of the present century with a recurrence of commercial panics and calamitous disorders of which we have not yet had a complete counterpart. Some other nations have been even less fortunate. When compelled to adopt the usual resort of forced loans and paper money, they have generally repudiated the claims of creditors and exhausted the resources of subjects.

Our history and opportunities have been different. At the close of the rebellion our traditional policy at once directed us to the ways of peace. Our cheap and fertile lands and our opening springs of trade offered inducements to our enterprising and active people. So it only remained for the Government to enforce rigid economy in all the departments and practices of the public service, and gradually retrace our steps until we reached the normal condition from which we had departed during the period of the war. The swollen volume of inconvertible currency should have been gradually reduced as a first vital step in the right direction. Such a prudent and conservative course, coupled with the singular buoyancy, the bounding activity, and the measureless resources, capacity, and opportunities of American enterprise, would have averted general derangement and distress. At least they would have served to counterbalance evils inseparable from our condition. As it is, these natural advantages and our national characteristics have operated, in some degree, as a protection against the crippling effect of falling prices, the fluctuations, and the paralysis usually following the unbending from the feverish strain and inflated standard of war to the more natural state of peace.

In the speech which I had the honor of addressing this body on the 25th of February, 1870, I remarked: "Glancing at what I have said, I repeat that the rescue of the nation from the evils of our vast depreciated inconvertible currency and its restoration to the specie basis are urgently required by every vital and wholesome interest; that the determination of the exact amount of currency demanded by the wants of the country is an indefinite and, comparatively, an unimportant problem—inflation on the one hand causing such a rise of prices that there would be the same stringency as before—contraction on the other hand, causing such a decline of prices that the smaller volume would entirely suffice—that the volume will adjust itself when we adopt correct principles and start upon the right path—that the true situation is when specie payments may be resumed and maintained, and, finally, that this is impossible under our present expanded currency." I also endeavored to maintain "that, while the scrupulous observance of the public faith is clearly enjoined upon us, a successful funding scheme, with new guarantees asserted, would tend to this result; and, lastly, that the reduction of taxation is highly important to the relief of the country, during this period of shrinking values, crippled industry, and inert trade, and that this is not inconsistent with adequate revenue and payment of the national debt in the course of fifty years."

These words touched upon all the salient features of our financial problem, and outlined a general policy. Three years and more have elapsed since these principles were thus stated, and in the subsequent course of events I see, in the confirmation of their general truth, a reason for their reiteration. The refunding of the debt has been commenced. The policy of reduced taxation, especially internal taxation, has been adopted. The fluctuations of the currency may not have taught everybody the folly of attempting to fix the exact amount required by the wants of the country compatible with specie payments, but they serve to confirm the belief that resumption is impossible with our present redundant volume of paper. Waiving this question for the present, I wish to direct your attention to some further observations on the subject of taxation, to which we are invited by the condition of exchange and trade as bearing with considerable directness and force upon any scheme of finance calculated to meet the exigency in which we find ourselves.

The complete view of a question upon all sides leads to the soundest conclusions. The late Secretary of the Treasury was not without some warrant for his statement that "large as the revenues of the country have been during the last three years, our system of taxation has not been oppressive to individuals, nor has it, in any sensible degree, embarrassed the business of the country."

I cannot assent to this proposition in its full scope. The daily experience of the mass of our people is a standing challenge to its correctness. No gloss can make a taxation of over three hundred millions a year other than a burden. It must come out of the industry of the people, except so far as it may be balanced by the protection of duties. The strain upon the resources of the country has been severe, and amid the increased expenditure, defalcation, and waste, the people have submitted to the burden imposed upon them by their desire to see the national obligations fulfilled and the national credit maintained. It is to the patience and patriotism of the masses rather than to the wisdom and economy of the Administration that this large sum has been so cheerfully furnished. It will not do to say that our burdens in this respect, heavy as they seem, are light compared with those which have been borne by many other nations. It is true Great Britain paid three hundred millions of taxes in 1816, the load falling practically upon not more than ten millions of population, and being aggravated, too, by a vicious, intricate, and confused system of taxation. It is also true that the aggregate product of the taxes levied through the Napoleonic war reached the prodigious sum of six billions five hundred millions of dollars, ($6,500,000,000,) and it was said by some that the capital of the country was as great as it would have been had the war never occurred. But the revulsions, failures, prostration, and ruin that followed, declare the fallacy of this statement. The deduction was based upon the assumption that the increase of industry and economy added to this additional burden had, in itself, been sufficient to pay the cost of the war. Such may be the effect of taxation within a moderate limit. When it is so adjusted that it does not foster immoderate profits or monopoly at home, or from its magnitude discourage production or consumption, it may sometimes have the opposite tendency of stimulating increased exertion and industry. The class taxed seek, by this augmented effort, to compensate for the exaction and so make itself whole. Sometimes it excites inventive enterprise, and ingenuity is quickened to find out ways of larger production in order to balance the loss. I believe it is true that the stimulus of taxation has here wrought some improvements in the methods of production; but these possible compensations have not been a match for the oppressiveness and demoralization which have resulted on the other hand. Instead of greater frugality growing out of the increased burden, we have had the extravagance and overdoing which follow in the train of large expenditures and a buoyant and inflated paper currency.

Then again the effect of a high tax upon importations is to encourage smuggling and fraud. Keeping pace with this is the inducement to revenue officers to take arbitrary, not to say unwarrantable, steps in the endeavor to effect seizures and extort penalties, the proof of which is obtainable in nearly every port of entry on our coast. Especially has this avaricious zeal been illustrated in our principal seaboard city. High taxes, exorbitant profits, and great temptations are the natural prelude to tyranny of wealth and a corruption of the public conscience. And not the least evil of this condition is the fact that the laws, and the practices under cover of them, secure to capital and the favored few undue accumulation over honest personal exertion.

Our financial situation has been distinguished by two features. On the one hand taxation, swollen and amplified by the inexorable demands of a gigantic and prolonged war, has pressed upon us with its complicated burdens. On the other side, an inflated currency and the activity created by war have raised prices and stimulated projects upon a fictitious standard, and imparted an air of buoyancy and speculative spirit to our commercial life. The latter has served to make the former seem less oppressive, while in fact it has led to continual excess. We have met high prices with high nominal resources. The exhilarance of this elastic vitality has served to balance the pall of taxation.

But we must descend from this elevated plane of hollow prosperity to the level of solid values and stable security. We must get back some way, and it is for us to determine whether it shall be by the abrupt and ruinous process or by well-prepared and comparatively easy methods. The return, at best, is as arduous and trying as the ascent was smooth and fascinating. Already, instead of expanded prices and inspirited activity we have seen shrinking values and depressed enterprise. Men less easily pay their debts—some are pushed to bankruptcy—producers receive less for their productions, business is restive, and the laborer in many districts is out of employment.

I have heretofore expressed the opinion that we might properly distribute the payment of our national debt through a period of fifty years. Honor is due to a people who uncomplainingly pay at the rate of $100,000,000 a year, but no credit is due to an administration of affairs which enjoins it when a less sum is the better rule of economy. Instead, attention should have been directed to our unredeemed and depreciated currency, and a part of these enormous collections left with the people to offset the shrinkage of values attendant upon a return to the specie condition. I do not assert that we can reduce the aggregate receipts from tax sources at present; and while we permit no actual increase the conditions may be at once improved.

I am here met with the official statement that our revenues are already falling off and are insufficient for the wants of the Government. True; but this does not impair the force of my argument. If the causes of our diminishing revenues were not transient I should still claim that we ought to meet all deficits, and more, by the practice of economy. This recourse would furnish an unfailing supply of full $50,000,000 annually, which now goes out in defalcation, fraud, and extravagance. But as we now go, swelling the volume of currency by at least $44,000,000, who can doubt that importations will not again swell, and, may be, overleap all previous bounds? So, too, of internal taxes. But I pass from this question of revenue. My point now is to show that it is only a simple and safe course to adjust the inequalities and hardships of taxation while we moderately contract the paper currency in the road to specie payments. In doing this we may reimpose a small duty on tea and coffee, and thus offset immediate or prospective reductions in other quarters. It is always a reliable source of revenue, and never much felt by the consumer because seldom affecting the price. It may be taken as a postulate, and verified by experience, that moderate taxes within rational limits are more reliable as well as more productive of revenue than high taxes. It is not my purpose to enter upon the disputed problems which gather around the discussion of protection upon the one hand and free trade upon the other. The policy of adjusting the collection of revenue so as to protect in some degree specific branches of industry, has obtained in our legislation, and for the present, at least, is hardly an open question. In what I have said upon this point I have been guided by a desire to show that in returning to a sound financial condition every interest of the Government and of the people concur in the policy of moderate taxes.

It is claimed that the value of our money is gradually and steadily advancing. If the premium on gold be the true index it is not so clear. But without accepting this fluctuating scale as at all times the correct measure—remembering that gold is a commodity, and low because of the scanty demand—and taking the general range of prices as the more reliable standard, it is true that there has been a rise in the value of money. It has acquired greater purchasing power. Shall we take advantage of this fact? If we make any permanent progress toward specie payments it must be attended by an appreciation of the currency. Such progress we all profess to seek, and to it we claim to direct the policy of the country. To accomplish it the circulating medium must be brought to the measure of specie. This may be done by a gradual and moderate reduction of the quantity of paper. At least this is the way which does not lead up to dazzling heights and down to horrible depths. I do not know what gentlemen mean when they speak of an "equalization of the commercial value of the paper currency with coin," unless it be upon the basis of the latter. The principle for which I contend has been well stated by a distinguished political economist in the following clear and compact form:

> When a country issues inconvertible paper notes, they cannot be exported to other countries in the event of their becoming redundant at home; and whenever, under such circumstances, the exchange with foreign states is depressed below, or the price of bullion rises above its mint price more than the cost of sending coin or bullion abroad, it shows conclusively that too much paper has been issued, and that its value is depreciated from excess.

There is still another point which urgently demands a return to the gold standard. Inordinate debt and speculation, entered into in time of peace, is mainly the offspring of an excessive and vitiated currency. I gave it as my best judgment, in some views submitted to the Senate during the last session, that the individual indebtedness of the country was full $8,000,000,000. After a careful examination of the subject since I am sure I did not overstate the amount. The late Census Report gives the public indebtedness of the States, including that of cities, counties, and towns, at a little less than $900,000,000. From the search I have been able to make of statistics bearing upon this point I am persuaded that this sum is $250,000,000 too small. Take the case of New York as an illustration. The Census Report puts it down at $150,000,000. But by a carefully prepared statement of the late constitutional commission of that State, made March 1, 1873, the aggregate bonded indebtedness of cities, villages, counties, and towns is given at $214,000,000. So I consider myself safe in stating that the indebtedness of the country —national, State, local, and individual—cannot fall much short of $12,000,000,000. To any other people such an enormous indebtedness would be appalling; to us the lesson is obvious. But this is not all. I have not included the railroad bond and mortgage indebtedness, which must come up to $600,000,000; it is probably more. So, without embracing current business obligations, such as bank loans, discounts, and other business paper, the amount of interest alone that we pay annually, at home or abroad—or ought to pay—I suppose is fully $720,000,000. No matter to whom paid, so far as it affects industry. This is the substratum upon which all indebtedness rests.

The payment of debt is always troublesome; but, so far as it owes its creation to an excessive and depreciated money condition, it will be found still more onerous and vexatious. There must be some privation, some suffering. Even though hard at first, we must return to the practice of frugality and industry. An example to the whole people of these cardinal virtues should come from the state, and no one can furnish it with such beneficent effect as the chief officer of the Government, supported by a great and powerful party. Instead of an expenditure by the Government of over $27,000,000 more for the past fiscal year than for the previous one, we must have a decrease of twice $27,000,000. It is now excessive; it would then be ample.

It will be borne in mind that a large amount of our indebtedness is held in Europe; and the interest and so much of the principal as we annually pay goes out of the country, to remain until we have something to buy it back with. Of this indebtedness there are national bonds, State bonds, municipal bonds, railroad bonds, and so on—in all, upon the best information I have, full $2,500,000,000. In addition to this, the balance of trade against us during the years alone from June 30, 1868, to June 30, 1873, as shown by the Treasury tables of exports and imports, was $300,000,000. We were likewise in debt to Europe from this source previous to 1868; and it is apparent that a part of these securities have been absorbed in arranging such indebtedness, instead of bringing to the country actual cash value at the time. In other words it was paying for what we had already consumed.

It may be admitted that inflated and inconvertible paper money leads to an expansion of debt, visionary schemes, wild speculation, and extravagance, and at last to frightful disasters and wide-spread distress. The men of business and the men of wealth are not alone in jeopardy. The great laboring population suffer largely from such an irregular and unnatural state of things. Their wages increased, but not in proportion to general prices. It may be that in the two years closing the 1st of September last prices depreciated more rapidly than wages, but when they were on the ascending scale the former outstriped the latter; and, taking the whole period together, the cost of living has advanced more than the means of support. It is also true that our agricultural interests have borne more of the burden and received less of the profits of the past unequal years. It should be kept in mind that the treasury from which we must draw the means for the ultimate extinguishment of our great debt is mainly in the resources of the soil. Our other favoring advantages, which are greatly beyond any other nation of the present day, rest upon this basis. The soil is our latent capital, and the prosperity of the country will be enhanced by offering the greatest encouragement to labor in the simple form necessary to its development. There would be little reason to complain if a prudent and stable system of finance had been inaugurated.

As seen, the existence of a depreciated currency has not operated to raise the price of the staple products of the farm, while almost everything else has felt the influence in increased price. The reason of this is to be found in the fact that we export the surplus of our farm staples, and the value is measured by the standard of other countries, which is gold. Thus, what our wheat is worth in gold for shipment fixes the value of the entire crop. As a remedy for this disadvantage, and in order to save the agricultural interest and the laborer from further unequal and unnecessary hardship, the currency should be restored to a healthy and normal state with the least practicable delay.

Again, when we look at our import and export business we find there is something wrong there. Overtrading, the waiting-maid of an inflated currency, here too frequently exhibits itself. High imposts in vain attempt to correct it. An examination leads at once to the fact that the effect of a derangement of the currency is to derange trade. To be sure the developments are not uniform. I do not concur with a prominent Senator on this floor, as reported at a recent lecture by him in New York, that an unfavorable balance of trade is the prime cause of our financial evils. It is bad enough, but, more strictly speaking, an unfavorable balance is rather the effect than the cause. While, therefore, a more favorable state of trade to us is altogether desirable we shall best promote such a condition by making our currency equivalent to gold. The immense expansion of 1836 carried the consumption of foreign commodities up to $10.93 per capita under a medium tariff; while under a still lower one in 1840, the expansion was but $5.21. In this connection it is not out of place to refer to the coincident increase of trade in the two most notable periods of currency expansion in our previous history. I embrace the year just mentioned, and come forward to another which is still fresh in our recollection. I do not here dwell upon the effects of the tariff, because it does not bear upon my argument upon this point. I only ask that it be kept in mind that taxation not only fails as a remedy for such a condition, but may even aggravate the difficulty.

Year.	Amount of currency.	Amount of imports.	Year.	Amount of currency.	Amount of imports.
1836....	255, 000, 000	189, 980, 035	1856...	408, 000, 000	314, 639, 942

In the amount of currency as here given I embrace both the circulation and deposits. The affinity observable in this table is broken, as will be seen, only in a single instance, and that is capable of a special explanation, as of a condition somewhat similar during the last three or four months. If we were to examine the statistics of exports for the same periods we should perceive a corresponding tendency to decline, though not as certain and uniform as the increase of imports. It will not do to congratulate ourselves on the past fall trade as a real change in our favor. Whatever there is of it may be traced to transient and extraordinary causes. If it were otherwise, our case would be even more critical, in that it would be evidence of a disturbed condition in Europe, which might tend to weaken confidence in our securities which are held there. Our indebtedness over the sea is so great and our commercial relations are so intimate and dependent that trouble there would increase our embarrassment here.

Here I am naturally led to the inquiry as to the amount of gold in the country and its supply. The amount in the States east of the Rocky Mountains in 1861 has been given by competent authority at $165,000,000. The annual productions of the mines average about $60,000,000, making a total for the thirteen years beginning with the fiscal year which closed June 30, 1861, and ending June 30, 1873, of about $780,000,000. The imports of coin for the same period were $244,459,652. On the other hand, the exports of coin and bullion amounted to $922,641,003. Allowance must also be made for a portion of the production of the mines which have been employed in the arts. What amount has been devoted to this use cannot be accurately determined; but if I fix it at $120,000,000 for the thirteen years it will be low enough. Treating the amount brought into the country by immigrants as offset by the amount taken away by travelers, the balance will stand thus:

Production of mines for thirteen years		780,000,000
Imports for same time		244,459,652
		1,189,459,652
Exports for thirteen years	$922,641,003
Used in the arts	120,000,000
Coin in Atlantic States, 1873		146,816,649

I have no doubt this sum is equal to the present amount of specie, notwithstanding the larger importations during the fall months—a sum about equal to the annual interest upon our indebtedness held abroad. To state the case another way: The average amount in the Treasury during the past few years has been about eighty million dollars. The banks hold also possibly twenty-five million dollars, and forty million dollars would be a liberal estimate for all that may be found in other hands; making not far from one hundred and forty-five million dollars, or less than one dollar of specie to every five of the paper issues. How are specie payments to be maintained with such a disproportion? Gold, if left free, will tend in the direction where there is the greatest demand. It may accumulate from temporary causes for a brief period, even when there is a redundancy of paper currency, but it will surely flow away again to other countries where it will have employment as a standard of value. We have, as matters now stand, little reason to hope for any permanent accumulation here. This position is fortified by the movements of specie during the last six years:

IMPORTS.		EXPORTS.
Year.	Amount.	Year.	Amount.
1868	$14,188,168	1868	$93,784,102
1869	19,807,876	1869	57,128,280
1870	26,419,179	1870	58,155,666
1871	21,270,024	1871	98,441,988
1873	21,480,937	1873	84,608,571

It thus appears that during these six years the net exports of specie amounted to $355,096,268, while the whole production of the mines for the corresponding period has been $360,000,000.

This leads me to repeat that for a resumption by the Government there must be a reduction of paper, so that paper and specie shall bear a recognized relation to each other. Does the practice of the Government give us any hope of this? I concede that the ultimate consequences of a steady flow of gold and silver from America and Australia into Europe are to raise general prices throughout the world. I am aware that an able writer in France, whose work has lately appeared, supported by a recent English authority, takes the other view, but I am led to admit that the purchasing power of gold in Europe must decrease; that it has somewhat already. So, if we could limit the volume of our currency, avoid heavy taxation, profligate expenditure, panics, and revulsions, and steadily maintain our national credit, I suppose we should finally reach a normal condition of trade and money. Of course such an improbable state of trade and such improbable conduct of Government would tend to equalize our paper with gold. Gold would return to us when an increase of quantity and enhanced prices abroad no longer offered inducements for it to remain there. And it is this theory which affords the liberty for men to say, "Let things alone; natural causes will soon bridge over the chasm which now separates coin from paper." The reasoning is specious and altogether unreliable.

Then, again, it is said we have none too much currency now for the business of the country. I do not here discuss the question of amount; I only say we cannot restore and maintain specie payment upon the present volume. In some remarks heretofore upon this point I said, if it is contended we have none too much currency for the requirements of business, I fully concur that we have none too much at present prices If it is said we ought to have twice as much, I concur that twice as much would not be too large a sum for the conditions which would then exist. If it is said we ought to have less currency, I do not question that less would suffice with the fall of prices which would accompany the reduction of volume. In one sense there never can be a redundancy of currency, for prices adjust themselves to the amount, and the more there is issued the more there is needed to make exchanges. Let us look at this matter in the light of history. The total bank circulation of England, as shown by the letter of Mr. George Walker, some time ago, was in 1868 less by two million dollars than in 1844. The debate on the currency in the English Parliament in July last disclosed the fact that the bank-note circulation has not been increased one dollar in thirty years past, although business has more than quadrupled. Our case does not bear an exact analogy; but the truth is, neither here nor there is money needed for its own sake. Apart from being the standard of value, its great purpose is to serve as the medium of exchange, as the instrument with which transfers are made and indebtedness discharged. In the case of England the explanation is very simple. A large amount of the business is done without the handling of money, as is more and more the practice in this country, and especially in the city of New York. Bank-checks and bills of exchange in Great Britain are the ordinary mediums of commerce. With us, deposits, checks, drafts, and other banking instrumentalities, are year by year more largely employed. These, with the vast increase in the rapidity and extent of internal communication, enable the same volume to effect a large number of transactions.

The real question is, what amount of currency can be maintained upon a specie basis? Experience teaches that the true relation is about one to three. In other words, from 1838 to 1857 there was a little less than three dollars of paper circulation to every dollar of specie in the banks. The largest circulation ever known in this country before the war was in 1857, when it ran up to $214,778,822. The disproportion of specie reserve from paper was then nearly four to one. A similar case was presented in 1837 and the disaster of suspension followed in both periods, as is well known. In the former year, before specie payments could be resumed and maintained, the paper was reduced over forty million dollars and in the later period over thirty million dollars. True, the country has made great progress, but the law of money is the same now as heretofore. There is still required an approximate relative proportion in the adjustment of currency upon a safe and sound basis.

But it is interposed that a reduction of the volume of paper money would produce corresponding stringency and distress. Yet, distress we now have and are to have, in the end still more severe, if we pursue the opposite course. The recent crisis, which brought prostration and ruin to almost every department of industry and trade, is alike an example and a warning. My desire is to adopt the plan which will prevent a recurrence of like disasters. In a word, to simplify the financial machinery, curtail expenditures, and steadily advance toward the specie condition. Theoretically all admit the importance of a return, but most persons are reluctant to do what will insure it. During the war, and for several years after, there was but one view of the currency question that found public utterance. Chase, Fessenden, and McCulloch concurred in opinion. So intent upon the work of contraction was Secretary McCulloch in 1866, that the business men of the West and Southwest asked to have a limit fixed to the amount of currency to be withdrawn by him each month. In obedience to this demand the Senate added to a resolution indorsing the Secretary's policy of contraction this proviso, "That of United States notes not more than ten million dollars may be retired and canceled within six months from the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than four million dollars in any one month."

Subsequently the amount of currency was limited to $356,000,000, and, as you know, the policy of contraction was abandoned. Suppose we had continued retiring the paper money at a moderate rate, and in the same ratio put the gold into circulation which we have kept in the Treasury; the process would not have continued long before the Government would have been in a situation to resume without producing serious hardship.

I hardly need say that I am in favor of the pending resolution offered by my associate upon the Committee on Finance, Mr. BAYARD, and I likewise support the one introduced by the chairman, Mr. SHERMAN, so far as it may be construed to favor a return of specie payments. Of other propositions, the best I have seen is the bill of my honorable friend, Mr. SUMNER. If it does not wholly warrant the hope of specie resumption, at least it would prevent our getting further off from it. I thank him for this contribution on behalf of a question the importance of which to our whole people cannot be overestimated. I should have rejoiced had the President and Secretary of the Treasury done so much.

It may be admitted by all that a well-matured plan by them, by reason of their commanding position, would have given impetus to our work and increased confidence to the people. What have they done? In the general treatment of the financial question the message of the one and the report of the other fully agree. Both seem to deprecate any direct inflation of the currency. Both concede the importance of resuming specie payments. They admit that resumption cannot be effected without a change in the existing condition, either by an enlargement of the stock of coin or a contraction of the volume of paper. Both urge the necessity of what is called "elasticity of the currency," and suggest substantially the same plan for accomplishing this object. In a word, they are both right in some of their general teachings, and they are both wrong in their practical recommendations. They assert that sound policy and public interest dictate a return to the specie basis, and that there is no real safety or permanent prosperity in any other condition. This is alike just and gratifying, as a truth vitally connected with the welfare of the country. But when we advance from general statements to the specific propositions, we find that the former are not borne out by the latter. The first criticism which suggests itself is, that while the President very properly assumes the importance of specie resumption, he not only does not point out the way, but points from the way. The Secretary, indeed, says "the volume of currency must be reduced, or that of coin greatly increased;" and, apparently adopting the latter alternative, he suggests that the banks be probibited from selling the gold received by them as interest upon their bonds pledged to secure circulation, and thus an accommodation shall be effected.

But the Secretary greatly errs in assuming that the one proposition is the equivalent of the other. A contraction of the currency would lead to resumption, because the decrease of the volume would increase the value until it was appreciated to par with gold. But to leave the volume of paper the same, and simply increase the stock of gold, would in no sense appreciate the value of the paper. Why is the paper depreciated? It may be that its irredeemability has something to do with it. But it cannot be the chief reason, for in 1862, though specie payment had been suspended and the bank notes were not redeemable, yet they were not depreciated as compared with coin. They even remained without depreciation for months, until the new issues of greenbacks were emitted and the volume of paper began to increase. There is no want of confidence in the security upon which our present currency is based. The depreciation is due, then, to the redundancy of the volume, and an increase in the stock of gold would not remove it. Even if the stock were increased until the ordinary proportion of coin to paper in time of specie payment, had been accumulated, it would not help the matter. The gold would be depreciated—that is, cheapened as measured by the standard of general prices—but the paper would not be appreciated. If redemption or resumption were undertaken under such circumstances, it could not be maintained, for the reason that the coin, being worth less here, would flow abroad, where it was worth more. The Secretary concedes that there should be no further inflation of the currency, but he seems to forget that to attempt resumption by the accumulation of gold is simply to swell the present volume by so much addition of specie as would, in the opinion of the Secretary, suffice to maintain constant convertibility. The inconsistency as well as the fallacy of his position is apparent. The least we can do is not to add so much outright, but to replace paper with gold to the required extent. This would not involve contraction, but on the other hand it would not involve inflation.

Apparently of the opinion, however, that immediate resumption is impracticable, both the President and the Secretary share a too common idea, that the usefulness of our existing currency would be enhanced if it could somehow acquire "elasticity," so that it might adapt itself to the fluctuating demands of changing seasons. This means inflation—an irredeemable currency grows with what it feeds on, and once out, it does not voluntarily return.

The President is right in saying "the exact medium is specie, the recognized medium of exchange the world over; that obtained, we shall have a currency of an exact degree of elasticity." At the same time he seems to cherish the idea that the attribute of elasticity can be artificially given by means of legislation to our paper currency. I do not misstate him, but commisserate the error apparent in this conflict of principle and opinion touching the same point. To the end that we may have this expanding currency as the seasons change, the President suggests that the Secretary of the Treasury be permitted to issue to the banks a certain amount, more or less, of currency in addition to their present issue, upon the deposit of an equivalent amount of bonds as security, the banks to forfeit 4 per cent. of the interest accruing on the bonds thus pledged, and to be authorized to withdraw the bonds, or any portion at any time, upon returning the bills for cancellation. The Secretary presents the same proposition in a little different form, suggesting that "provision may be made to permit the national banks, under circumstances, and to a limited extent, to increase their note circulation by a pledge of United States bonds bearing no interest while so pledged."

No one will dispute that these propositions also mean inflation so long as the additional notes thus issued remain outstanding. But it is urged that the issue will not be sought except in pressing emergencies, and will be recalled as soon as the necessity—say the movement of the crops—passes away. But this is by no means clear. Indeed, the reasoning is fallacious. The proposition, reduced to its practical terms, simply requires the banks to pay 4 per cent. for the privilege of using money which they loan at 7 per cent., or even a higher rate. Many of them have been paying 4 per cent. for deposits which they might be called upon to restore at any time. Why should they not be glad to pay 4 per cent. for the equivalent of deposits which they need pay only at their own pleasure? Would it not be for their interest to secure such an issue, and, securing it, to keep it as long as possible? There is another, and even more conclusive, view of this case. Independent of the consideration just presented, what reason is there to believe that if there were such an issue it would be returned at any time for cancellation? The increased issue would increase prices; more money would be required to transact the same business, and there would be just as great a stringency as before. The present bank-note circulation is about three hundred and fifty million dollars. Forty per cent. of that amount is $140,000,000. The issue of any such sum, instead of affording real relief, would expand prices so that the increased volume would be just as necessary for the business of the country as the smaller volume was before. For this reason the notes would not be returned for cancellation, and the measure would produce permanent inflation. We are having a small edition of this policy now, and its effect in Wall street and in some other directions is plainly seen.

In conclusion, am I not warranted in saying that we find no sure guide in the words of these two State papers? We must, therefore, look for light from some other quarter, and acting at last upon our own best judgment, we can hardly fail to adopt that wiser course which is supported alike by philosophy and experience. We shall thus save the country from a further career of financial demoralization with its attendant disasters, so fatal to national morality and true progress.

Mr. CROZIER. I desire to submit some remarks to the Senate on a bill that I introduced the other day, and I therefore ask that the pending resolution may be laid aside for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of that bill. It is of the very greatest consequence to my people. After I have explained it, I propose to move its reference to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have not been able to hear the remarks of the honorable Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SARGENT in the chair.) The Senator from Kansas moves that the pending resolution be laid aside in order that the Senate take up for consideration a measure affecting the people of Kansas.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am extremely anxious to ask the Senate to consider the naval deficiency bill, of which I gave notice yesterday, but certainly I do not desire to interfere with the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CROZIER. I shall not detain the Senate long.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I give notice, then, that, at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator, I shall ask the Senate to take up the naval deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. MCCREERY. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. I have agreed to give way to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in order that he may submit his bill, with the understanding that the Senate will allow me the floor to-morrow at the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator from Kansas will be allowed now to proceed with his remarks without any further interruption.

Mr. CROZIER. What I desire is that the pending resolution be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the pending resolution be laid aside informally.

The motion was agreed to.

SETTLERS ON OSAGE CEDED LANDS.

Mr. CROZIER. I now move that the Senate take up Senate bill (No. 165) for the relief of the settlers on the Osage ceded lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CROZIER. I ask that the bill be reported in full. It is a very short one.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Attorney-General of the United States shall cause to be instituted in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas, in the name and on behalf of the United States, one or more suits, each against the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad Company, and the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad Company, to set aside and cancel patents for portions of the lands known as the Osage ceded lands, in the State of Kansas, occupied and entered under the joint resolution concerning the same, approved April 10, 1869, by the settlers thereon; which patents purport to have been issued by the United States to said railroad companies, respectively, in pursuance of the acts of Congress of March 3, 1863, and July 26, 1866, granting lands to said companies; and in case the decision of said circuit court shall be in favor of the validity of such patents, the Attorney-General shall, without delay, cause such suits to be appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States for the purpose of a final adjudication of the questions involved therein. In case of such appeal, or an appeal by said railroad companies, or either of them, it shall be the duty of the Supreme Court to hear and determine such causes at the earliest practicable day, without regard to their places upon the docket. The Attorney-General is authorized to accept the aid of any attorney or attorneys named by the settlers upon the lands concerning which such suits shall be instituted: Provided, That the United States shall not be liable for the compensation of such attorney or attorneys.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator from Kansas whether he will not yield to allow the Senate to take up the House resolution fixing the time for a recess?

Mr. CROZIER. Will that take any considerable time?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator from Kansas had better be allowed to proceed and conclude his remarks.

Mr. WINDOM. I give notice, then, that immediately after the conclusion of the Senator's speech I shall endeavor to obtain the floor for the purpose of calling up that resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to remark, as matter of notice, that as soon as anybody is through who now has the floor, I shall endeavor to obtain the floor for the purpose of disposing of the bankrupt question, in order that the Judiciary Committee may, in the regular way, if the Senate are willing to trust us, make diligent effort to get that bill ready for your consideration to-morrow.

Mr. CROZIER. Mr. President, it will be at once seen that in passing this bill the Senate will not thereby attempt to determine the validity or invalidity of the patents therein referred to. It will only provide for a reference of the questions involved to the proper judicial tribunals. But even this should not be done unless, upon an examination of the admitted facts and the laws applicable thereto, it shall be found there is a substantial question as to where the equitable title is, and where the legal title to the lands mentioned should be placed. I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I briefly state the former and refer to the latter.

For a long time prior and down to June 2, 1825, the Great and Little Osage Indians occupied a large tract of country west of the Missouri River. On that day they ceded to the United States all their lands, with a reservation as follows:

Within the limits of the country above ceded and relinquished there shall be reserved to and for the Great and Little Osage tribes or nations aforesaid, so long as they may choose to occupy the same, the following-described tract of land, &c. (7 Statutes at Large, 240.)

By force and effect of this clause the lands therein referred to became an Indian reservation, and as such were occupied by the Great and Little Osages until parts thereof were surrendered to the United States in 1867 and 1871, as will be hereafter explained. I beg to call attention specially to the language of the treaty: "There shall be reserved to the Great and Little Osage tribes," &c., the importance of which phraseology will subsequently appear.

On the 3d of March, 1863, Congress passed an act granting to the State of Kansas, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of what is now the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad, the odd-numbered sections of land for ten miles on each side thereof; and if when the line of the railroad should be definitely located it should appear that any of such odd-numbered sections had been sold by the United States, or homestead or pre-emption rights had attached thereto, or were in any manner reserved by the United States for any purpose, other lands to an equal amount, in lieu thereof, were to be taken within twenty miles on either side of the road. The section of the act making the grant contains this proviso:

And provided further, That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States, by any act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement, or for any other purpose whatsoever, be, and the same are hereby, reserved to the United States from the operations of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the routes of said road and branches through such reserved lands; in which case the right of way only shall be granted, subject to the approval of the President of the United States. (12 Statutes, 773.)

It must be apparent from this language that the lands reserved by the treaty of 1825 which lay in the path of the proposed railroad were not only not included in the grant, but were expressly excluded therefrom, except to the extent necessary for a right of way. Certainly, were there nothing else in law or treaty from which to deduce a grant of the odd-numbered sections, the railroad's claim to them would be a baseless one. The Indian title to no portion of the Osage reservation of 1825 had been extinguished, nor was it then in contemplation to extinguish it.

On the 26th of July, 1866, another act of Congress was passed, similar in all respects to the one I have mentioned, granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of what is now the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad, containing this provision:

Provided, That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement or other purpose whatever, be, and the same are hereby, reserved and excepted from the operation of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the route of said road through such reserved lands, in which case the right of way, two hundred feet in width, is hereby granted, subject to the approval of the President of the United States. (14 Statutes, 289.)

Could any lawyer be found bold enough to insist that this act, containing as it does such a proviso, operated as a grant of the Osage Indian reservation, through which it was proposed to build the road? Is it not absolutely conclusive that no such grant was intended? Is not the supposition of such grant unequivocally negatived?

On the 29th of September, 1865, the United States concluded a treaty with the Great and Little Osages, which was proclaimed by the President January 21, 1867, (14 Statutes, 687,) the first and second articles of which are as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The tribe of Great and Little Osage Indians having now more lands than are necessary for their occupation, and all payments from the Government to them under former treaties having ceased, leaving them greatly impoverished, and being desirous of improving their condition by disposing of their surplus lands, do hereby grant and sell to the United States the lands contained within the following boundaries, that is to say: Beginning at the southeast corner of their present reservation, and running thence north with the eastern boundary thereof fifty miles to the northeast corner; thence west with the boundary line thirty miles; thence south fifty miles to the southern boundary of said reservation; and thence east with said southern boundary to the place of beginning: Provided, That the western boundary of said land herein ceded shall not extend farther westward than upon a line commencing at a point on the southern boundary of said Osage country one mile east of the place where the Verdigris River crosses the southern boundary of the State of Kansas. And in consideration of the grant and sale to them of the above-described lands, the United States agree to pay the sum of $300,000; which sum shall be placed to the credit of said tribe of Indians in the Treasury of the United States; and interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum shall be paid to said tribe semi-annually in money, clothing, provisions, or such articles of utility as the Secretary of the Interior may from time to time direct. Said lands shall be surveyed and sold, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, on the most advantageous terms, for cash, as public lands are surveyed and sold under existing laws, but no pre-emption claim or homestead settlement shall be recognized; and after reimbursing the United States the cost of said survey and sale, and the sum of $300,000 placed to the credit of said Indians, the remaining proceeds of sales shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the "civilization fund," to be used, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the education and civilization of Indian tribes residing within the limits of the United States.

ART. 2. The said tribe of Indians also hereby cede to the United States a tract of land twenty miles in width from north to south, off the north side of the remainder of their present reservation, and extending its entire length from east to west; which land is to be held in trust for said Indians, and to be surveyed and sold for their benefit by the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules and regulations as he may from time to time prescribe, under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as other lands are surveyed and sold. The proceeds of such sales, as they accrue, after deducting all expenses incident to the proper execution of the trust, shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of said tribe of Indians, and the interest thereon, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, shall be expended annually for building houses, purchasing agricultural implements, and stock animals, and for the employment of a physician and mechanics, and for providing such other necessary aid as will enable said Indians to commence agricultural pursuits under favorable circumstances: Provided, That 25 per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sale of said trust lands, until said percentage shall amount to the sum of $80,000, shall be placed to the credit of the school fund of said Indians; and the interest thereon, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, shall be expended semi-annually for the boarding, clothing, and education of the children of said tribe.

The Senate, having this treaty under consideration, June 26, 1866, proposed certain amendments, which were, on the 21st of September, 1866, accepted by the Indians, and among which was the following:

Article 1, line 38, after the word "laws" insert the following: "Including any act granting lands to the State of Kansas, in aid of the construction of a railroad through said lands;" so that the clause as amended reads: "Said lands shall be surveyed and sold, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, on the most advantageous terms, for cash, as public lands are surveyed and sold under existing laws, (including any act granting lands to the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of a railroad through said lands,) but no pre-emption claim or homestead settlement shall be recognized."

The Senate is not to be astonished when it is stated that the only claim the railroad companies have, or pretend to have, to the Osage ceded lands is founded upon this clause of the treaty. By what process of reasoning any fair-minded, honest man can support and defend such claim is to me an incomprehensible mystery. The only laws granting lands in aid of the construction of railroads which, by any possible construction, could be made to apply to these lands are the acts of March 3, 1863, and July 26, 1866, already referred to, and I have shown that they were expressly reserved from the operation of these laws.

And again, there is no provision in these laws, or in any other applicable one, for the "sale" of lands granted "in aid of the construction of railroads through said lands;" yet it has been held in some of the Executive Departments that the amendment to the treaty did operate as a grant, and has been carried into effect accordingly.

But let us look a little more searchingly into the provisions of the treaty. It will be observed that the lands embraced therein are divided into three classes: First, thirty by fifty miles off the east end of the reservation of 1825—which includes the lands in controversy between the settlers and the railroad companies—to be sold "for cash;" second, a tract twenty miles wide from north to south, off the north side of the remainder of the reservation ceded in trust to the United States, to be sold for the benefit of the Indians; and, third, the remainder to be reserved for the use of the Indians as a home, until they should choose to leave it for a new one to be provided for them in the Indian country south of Kansas. It is with the first class we have more particularly to do.

It is to be observed that by the treaty, in terms absolute, the Indians "grant and sell to the United States" the lands of the first class, in consideration of which the United States agrees to place to their credit in the Treasury $300,000, the interest thereon, at 5 per cent. per annum, to be paid them semi-annually. If this were the only provision of the treaty upon the subject it could not well be doubted that the interest of the Indians was wholly divested, and the title to the lands vested completely and absolutely in the Government, the whole proceeds of the sales of which might be disposed of as it saw fit.

But such is not the fact. The treaty goes on to provide that "no pre-emption claim or homestead settlement thereon shall be recognized;" that "the lands shall be surveyed and sold," "on the most advantageous terms, for cash, as public lands are surveyed and sold under existing laws." But what is to be done with the proceeds of the sales? To be held by the Government for its own benefit? Not at all. "After reimbursing the United States the cost of said survey and sale, and the sum of $300,000 placed to the credit of said Indians, the remaining proceeds of sales shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the 'civilization fund,' to be used under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for the education and civilization of Indian tribes residing within the limits of the United States." Is it not perfectly clear that, after reimbursing itself, the Government was to hold the remainder of the proceeds of sales in trust, to be used for the benefit of the Indian tribes, the Great and Little Osages among the rest? And if so, how was that to be done if the railroad companies were to get them, not "for cash," but as a gratuity? Can it be supposed that these untutored Indians, ignorant of the jurisprudence of the country and innocent of all knowledge of the subtleties of the laws pertaining to real-estate titles, trusts, and vested rights, considered they were giving away half of one million acres of the best of their lands to railroad companies they could not have known anything about? The treaty, even as amended, contains no words of grant, literally construed. If the amendment accomplishes any legitimate object, it is that of securing the assent of the Indians to the right of way through their lands, granted by the acts of Congress, and to a sale of them subject thereto. It could in legal contemplation have no other effect. It vested no right in the railroad companies for any other purposes than the right of way.

On the 26th of April and 17th of May, 1867, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, on the application of the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad Company for the withdrawal of these lands from market, decided that the lands had not been granted to the railroad company, whereupon the President issued his proclamation for the sale thereof, in pursuance of the treaty and the laws applicable to the sale of public lands. An appeal having been taken from the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary of the Interior, (then Mr. Browning,) that officer on the 8th of November, 1867, reversed the decision of the Commissioner and decided there was a grant of these lands by the act of Congress and treaty I have referred to, in pursuance of which the President withdrew his proclamation ordering the sale.

On the 10th of April, 1869, Congress passed the following joint resolution:

Be it resolved, &c., That any bona fide settler residing upon any portion of the lands sold to the United States by virtue of the first and second articles of the treaty concluded between the United States and the Great and Little Osage tribe of Indians, September 29, 1865, and proclaimed January 21, 1867, who is a citizen of the United States, or shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, shall be, and hereby is, entitled to purchase the same, in quantity not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, at the price of $1.25 per acre, within two years from the passage of this act, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, however, That both the odd and even numbered sections of said lands shall be subject to settlement and sale as above provided: And provided further, That the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in each township of said lands shall be reserved for school purposes in accordance with the provisions of the act of admission of the State of Kansas: Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed in any manner affecting any legal rights heretofore vested in any other party or parties. (16 Statutes, 55.)

In pursuance of this joint resolution, the settlers thereon purchased from the United States many of the lands therein referred to, paid their money for them, and received the usual certificate entitling them to patents. Therefore, supposing their titles were assured, the settlers proceeded to spend their money and labor on the lands; and now the Osage ceded lands are among the best improved and most desirable in the State, and worth, if the titles were settled, from twenty to thirty dollars per acre; much of which is owing to the improvements thereon. On the application of the railroad companies these entries have been and are being canceled, and patents issued to them.

Now, is it not manifest that there has been a great wrong committed in this business somewhere and by somebody? And if so, is there not a remedy in some direction? In this state of fact, is there not a substantial question as to the right of the railroad companies to patents for these lands? Is there not in all this sufficient at least to hang a reasonable doubt upon, and a very reasonable one too? Were it a transaction between individuals, is there a lawyer or enlightened layman who would not say that here is a proper question for judicial arbitrament?

In answer, it may be unthinkingly said that the courts are permanently open to the citizens for the redress of grievances judicially remediable. I reply that generally they are; but situated as these settlers are, the courts are as against them closed; yea, hermetically sealed. In the present condition of things the local courts have no jurisdiction of the subject, and can have none. Repeated efforts have been made to agree upon and submit to the Federal courts of the district an agreed case that should present the questions involved for adjudication, but the railroad companies, knowing the advantages of the situation, have constantly refused. The heads of Departments here who have the power to do so have been requested and urged to authorize the bringing of suits that would result in an authoritative adjudication of the rights of the parties to this controversy, but they have so far refused to submit the matter to such arbitrament. There is nothing now left but an appeal to the sense of justice and the consciences of the representatives of the whole people, which appeal I now stand here to make, in the name and on behalf of thirty thousand as worthy citizens as go to make up the population and contribute to the support of this proud Republic.

I am not asking the Senate to decide for or against the right of the railroad companies to patents for this land. What I ask is, that you may take such action as will bring about a judicial examination and determination of where the right is. Such an arbitrament cannot be secured without your aid. Shall it be said that thirty thousand citizens, helpless in any other direction, have appealed to you in vain?

If you ask me why this appeal, "I shall answer, I shall tell you," that there is no other power in the land to which, with propriety, it can be addressed. The governor of my State, who takes a deep interest in the welfare of and sympathizes with the settlers in their extremity, has appealed to the Chief Executive of the nation; the whole people of the State through their representatives in the Legislature have done the same; but he is powerless in the premises. Tthe settlers have besieged the Executive Departments, imploring a submission to judicial arbitrament. All has been vain; and, as a last resort, they are driven to the portals of this place of high deliberation and ultimate discretion.

Every lawyer knows that, without the legal title, these people could have no standing in a Federal court. No matter how equitable their claims, or how inequitable those of their adversaries, they cannot be heard in their own behalf in the only tribunals that can ultimately settle the controversy. Will you secure to them that privilege? If I have here stated the case fairly, is there a Senator who would refuse it to them?

This is not a controversy that concerns alone the occupants of the Osage ceded lands. Every citizen of the State has an interest in its settlement. It is a country larger than one of the States of this Union, and among the most beautiful the sun shines upon. The groves are delightful as any that were "God's first temples;" the streams as limped as the waters that gushed from the cleft rock of Old Testament memory; the soil, to its tillers, generous beyond remuneration, even to abundance; the climate such as the gods might choose for perennial habitations; the depressions and swells of the landscape as voluptuous as the most ardent artist could imagine for the proportions of the bewitching daughter of Jove; never-fading green habilitates its graceful slopes; and the gentlest of breezes, freighted with the odors of the most fragrant of flowers, perpetually intoxicate the senses, making existence thereon a realization of the dreams of bucolic poets from Virgil to Grey.

This beautiful country is a part of my State. The inhabitants thereof are a part of my people. They are not proletarian or cumberers of the ground, but many of them are men of substance and intelligence, and all are enterprising, energetic citizens. They very naturally desire to know whether their labors are to inure to the benefit of themselves, their wives and little ones, or are to aggrandize the managers of a colossal monopoly, antagonistic to them in aim, spirit, and interest. If you refuse to pass this bill, thirty thousand of as worthy citizens as ever contributed to the stability of a government or power of a state will, without a hearing, be driven from their homes to be wanderers and vagabonds upon the face of the earth, and by an invader panoplied in the mail of departmental sophistry and bristling with departmental subtleties.

I would not have it understood that I or the people most directly interested in this controversy harbor malice or animosity toward the projectors and operators of the iron highways that have connected them with the great world of commerce. They have done noble work and deserve fitting gratitude and praise. But it does not follow that they are to be justified in confiscating, under pretended legal forms, the homes of thirty thousand people guilty of no crime and defenseless against injustice.

The controversy has swollen to the proportions of a party question. Men are elected to office with reference to it, regardless of national party predilection. The question is not, is the candidate a republican or democrat, a liberal or other nondescript; but is he in favor of justice to the settlers? A feeling in their favor has been wrought up all over the State until their cry of distress and appeal for help constitute the billow now irresistibly sweeping over the Commonwealth. Will the Senate of the United States sit with folded hands, upon its dizzy height, and complacently look down upon thirty thousand people writhing and struggling in the remorseless clutches of a slimy dragon unwittingly fostered by its action? The grasping monster is stalking through the land in the penetrable mail of departmental sophistry, and helmeted with legislative techniciality, gathering into his capacious maw the heritage of a defenseless people. In their deep distress they appeal to you for aid. Shall they appeal in vain?

If it be asked whether the action invoked by this bill is legitimate, the answer is a ready one. The question is not an open one. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Stone vs. The United States, reported in 2 Wallace, page 525, shows that it is competent for the Government to go into its own courts and ask a revocation of its own patent when improvidently issued; that the power to that end is a judicial one, deposited by the Constitution in the national tribunals alone. All that is asked of you is that their machinery may be set it motion.

No doubt it is competent for the head of the proper Department, as the law now stands, to invoke the action of the courts. The case I have referred to was a suit instituted by myself, as district attorney of the United States, by direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to set aside and cancel patents improvidently issued under a treaty with the Delaware Indians for portions of Fort Leavenworth military reservation. The decree of the circuit court canceling the patents was affirmed by the Supreme Court. But in the matter referred to in this bill the departmental chief declines to submit the controversy to judicial investigation and determination, and hence your action is invoked compelling it. The settlers never will voluntarily leave the lands until their right thereto is denied by the great tribunal of last resort; and this Government ought not to be guilty of the injustice of driving thirty thousand citizens from their homes without a hearing.

I move, Mr. President, that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask my colleague also to include in that motion Senate bill No. 116, introduced by myself, authorizing proceedings to be instituted in the United States circuit court for the district of Kansas to determine title to Osage ceded lands.

Mr. CROZIER. I will do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That reference will be ordered if there be no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 478) to provide for the redemption of the loan of 1858; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill which has this morning come from the House of Representatives to amend the laws relative to internal revenue, in order that it may be referred to the Committee on Finance. It is a measure greatly demanded, on which the Internal Revenue Department, as well as a great many gentlemen in the West whom I represent, desire speedy action. The revenue is now tied up in consequence of a defect in the law, in case of the death of parties owing taxes. I only ask that the bill be taken up and referred.

The bill (H. R. No. 614) to so amend the laws relative to internal revenue as to allow distillery warehouses to be continued in use after changes have occurred in the management of the business was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PROPOSED HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. WINDOM. I now ask the Senate to take up the House resolution fixing the time for the holiday recess.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that question is put, I desire to have the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] who has charge of the naval appropriation bill, present. He said he desired to be present before that question was taken up. He has gone out for a moment.

Mr. WINDOM. I presume the Senate might take up the resolution, and then await the coming in of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to that, because it was on that very point that the Senator from Maine desired to say a word to the Senate. He has just gone out—not a minute ago. I hope, therefore, the Senate will not take up that resolution. But I see that the Senator from Maine is here now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the resolution of the House of Representatives providing for an adjournment during the holidays be now taken up.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That will lead to debate, beyond all question, and I trust that no motion of that kind will be interposed against the naval appropriation bill, of which I gave notice yesterday, and for the passage of which there is the utmost necessity.

Mr. WINDOM. There is so much talking around me that I cannot understand what the Senator says.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator insist on his motion?

Mr. WINDOM. I do. I do not know but that the Senator from Maine may have made some personal appeal to me which I did not understand. If he did, I should like to hear it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was appealing to the sense of the Senate not to take up that resolution at the present time, after the notice I had given yesterday of a desire to proceed with the deficiency bill for the Navy. My honorable friend is upon the Committee on Appropriations, and he knows well the importance of it; and this resolution must necessarily lead to debate.

Mr. WINDOM. I presume there can be no doubt that the bill referred to by the Senator from Maine can be taken up and disposed of if we now fix the time for the recess on Friday.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is a presumption; the fact remains to be seen. Here is a bill from the House of Representatives, not yet considered by the Senate, said to be of exigent importance, about which there is a difference of opinion unquestionably and which undoubtedly will give rise to debate. I refer to the bankrupt bill, not yet considered by the Judiciary Committee. Nobody expects to adjourn until that bill is considered, and there is one day between us and the time fixed by the House of Representatives when it is said it is safe for the American Congress, after having been here exercised for three long weeks doing nothing so far as results are concerned, to adjourn from this year to the next. It may be that that is so; but if it is so, I misconceive altogether the events of the public character that are transpiring about us.

It seems to me that the Senate owes it to itself, and owes it to the country, to attend to such things as are pressing upon us now, and fix this question of adjournment when they shall have been accomplished. If the naval bill be passed to-day, this can be considered to-morrow. What is the necessity of considering the resolution at this moment to the exclusion of a bill of the character that I have the honor to represent on this floor—a deficiency bill from the House of Representatives appropriating $1,000,000 for the Navy; a deficiency needed by the Navy, demanded by the public service. And yet we are in such hot haste to take a recess of sixteen days that this must be excluded that we may go into a discussion upon that subject. That may be statesman-like; that may be wise; and, if we come back at the end of sixteen days and find the complications which I predict we shall, it may be that we shall then consider that it would have been a little prudent, perhaps, to act on the subjects that were immediately pressing on us. I shall have accomplished my duty when I say that I am ready to proceed to the consideration, and ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration, of the bill to provide for the deficiency of $4,000,000 which is necessary for the naval service under the circumstances in which it exists. If the Senate chooses to overrule that, and fix upon a day for adjournment with that and other bills which they know are pressing upon us, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I hardly know what course to take on the motion I have made in view of the statements of friends in whose judgment I have great faith; but as I have more confidence in the judgment of the entire Senate than I have in my own, or that of my three or four friends who have protested, it has occurred to me that the wisest thing I can do now is to take the judgment of the Senate on this question of a recess.

Mr. President, for the last fourteen years—certainly twelve years—I have tried to make precisely the same speech, but never succeeded in making it half so well, however, as that which the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] has delivered to-day. I have been, since my service in Congress, both in the House of Representatives and here, the persistent opponent every time a motion was made to adjourn over for a recess, and I have been as consistently beaten as I have been persistent in my efforts to defeat it; and I can only say to my honorable friend from Maine, that while I have great respect for his judgment in this matter, and while his appeal has very great weight with me, I am quite confident that whether we act upon it to-day or to-morrow, the same results will follow that have always followed every motion of this kind. Hence, having tried so many years to resist this adjournment over for the holidays, and feeling confident that the recess will be taken, it has occurred to me that the Senate might as well know to-day as to-morrow or the next day whether the recess will be taken or not. Therefore, Mr. President, I insist on my motion, in order to take the sense of the Senate on this question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, we have had a holiday from the 26th of March to the 1st of December, and we have devoted ourselves vigorously, by adjourning from Thursday until Monday, since the 1st of December to this day, which is the 17th. We have worked almost two weeks in the course of eight or nine months, and the necessity therefore for a holiday for the restoration of our bodies and our souls must be very great indeed. [Laughter.]

But to be serious about this business, Mr. President, and not to indulge in the little humor one might express upon it, where do we find ourselves? We find ourselves, according to a message from the President of the United States, and a report from the head of the Treasury Department, running behind hand nearly half a million dollars a day. We find ourselves with expenditures running almost in advance of appropriations, and upon the faith that we should appropriate for them, for the protection of the honor and the interests of this country; and the men who have earned this money, in the naval service in particular, and who are now working daily in the performance of the labors they are employed about, must be paid. I believe there would be no dissension in this body as to the fact that provisions should be made, that they should be paid and paid now, so that jobbers and traders and dealers in poor men's labor should not be having certificates of indebtedness hawked about the streets to pay half-price upon before the laborer can get anything.

Mr. President, in that point of view, as the Senator from Maine has said, are we going to take a holiday of two or three weeks, leaving that bill unacted upon? Can we not wait until we do that? Suppose we do not adjourn until next week, will the public interests suffer? Most certainly not. It will only be our private pleasure and convenience that will suffer.

Then we have the bankrupt law to which reference has already been made. It is of the highest interest to the community that some steps shall be taken that shall advise the public all over the land what relief is to be extended to the debtors and what justice to the creditors, in order that both debtor and creditor may have fair and equal justice distributed between them. Are we going away for fun, are we going away for the roast turkey and the duck of Christmas, leaving such things undisposed of? Are we, in order to go away for such purpose of pleasure—they are as agreeable to me as to anybody; I would like to take the trip—making haste with these important measures in such a way that we are not sure that we are legislating on solid and rational grounds? It cannot be, Mr. President; it is impossible, when we reflect upon it, as it seems to me, that we should leave the public business in the condition in which it will be if we agree to this resolution to adjourn on the day after to-morrow, without making ourselves justly deserving of that public censure which we sometimes receive without deserving.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the concurrent resolution in regard to an adjournment over the holidays.

Mr. THURMAN. I only wish to say that in my judgment we ought not to adjourn on Friday. There are measures now before Congress which I think ought to be acted upon without delay. There is the question of repealing, or, if not repealing, amending the bankrupt act. I think that it ought to be acted upon. I think we ought also to act on the bill in relation to salaries, which probably will come from the House of Representatives to-day or, at latest, to-morrow. And there are other measures upon which we ought to act, to say nothing about the great financial questions which are before Congress, but upon which, I suppose, no one imagines we can act before a recess is taken; but these other measures we can act upon, and it seems to me that we should sit here until we do so. Hence, contrary to my usage heretofore, I am in favor of sitting here until these measures shall be acted upon, and therefore opposed to this recess.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, like the Senator from Minnesota, the first two or three years I was in the Senate I opposed these long adjournments at the holidays, but my opposition amounted to nothing. Never, however, has there been a condition of things since I have been in the Senate that required the presence of Congress like that which we have now. The Senator speaks of the long usage. It will be "more honored in the breach than in the observance." Now, sir, the country is laboring under the effects of a panic. We are told the consequences of it are passing off. To some extent they are; but there is suffering all over this country to-day in consequence of that panic, and thousands, and I may say hundreds of thousands of men are out of employment, and likely to be all this winter; and there is a prospect of a long, hard winter, full of suffering and full of stern discontent, too; and the whole country is expecting that Congress will do something upon the financial question. I do not know that we can do anything to relieve the country from the consequences of the panic; I do not know that we cannot; but I do know that the country is demanding that we shall consider that question and consider it promptly; and if we shall go away now for nearly three weeks without considering that question, it will be regarded by the country as trifling with its interests. The country will understand that there is no occasion for the holiday. As was said, we have had a holiday since the 26th day of March to attend to our private business and take our pleasure, and we have been variously employed during that time, and we know there is no necessity for this holiday. It may suit the convenience of many Senators; it may suit the pleasure of others; but we know that there is no necessity for it, while we do know that there is a necessity for legislation of various kinds.

The taking of this holiday now will not give the country pleasure, but will give it displeasure. We ought not to adjourn until we have disposed of the bankrupt law. If there is one sentiment that is almost universal in the whole country, it is that that law ought to be repealed, or at least ought to be so modified that it shall no longer become the instrument of great oppression as it has been heretofore, and as it is likely to be more now than it has ever been before. I say the sentiment is almost universal that we should do something with regard to that law, and do it before we adjourn.

There are other questions that ought to be considered. I should be willing, for my part, to adjourn over Christmas and to adjourn over New-Year's, but I am utterly opposed to the idea of adjourning for sixteen or seventeen days merely because they are the holidays, with nothing to do when we get home that cannot be put off. It may suit the convenience of some Senators. Some may have business; and those who have business can go home and nobody will complain about it. Senators do leave here on their private business and stay away a week, two weeks, a month, or three months, as I have known them to do, and nobody has complained about it, and not a word has been said in the newspapers on the subject. If any Senator has important business that requires him to go home and stay a week or two weeks, he can do so, and no complaint will be made. It is not necessary for Congress to adjourn on that account. I believe that there will be deep dissatisfaction, and that there will be broad foundation for it, if we shall now determine in the face of the condition of the country, to adjourn this body for nearly three weeks. I desire to enter my protest against it. I am not at all sanguine that it will have any effect. It is very likely the resolution will carry; but I desire to record my protest against it.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I only wish to add to what has been said a very few words in opposition to this resolution. I am opposed to the adjournment; and, without giving my reasons in extenso, I will substitute the reasons which have been given by other gentlemen who have spoken in the same direction. I rose merely to call attention to one matter before the Senate which has been mentioned by other Senators; and that is the bankrupt law; and I desire to detain the Senate only for a moment in presenting one case in a letter from a gentleman, which I have before me, showing that that law is being used as the instrument of oppression in parts of the country, if not all over the country.

I have here a letter, one out of many, from a gentleman in the city of Chicago, one of the best men in that city, which I received yesterday, in which he gives me the facts of his case, accompanied by a statement of his property unincumbered—a statement made to his creditors. He is indebted $36,000; he has $400,000 of unincumbered property in real estate; he has notes drawing interest amounting to $200,000; he has real property under mortgage amounting to $200,000, and the mortgage due in five years. There has been a petition presented in bankruptcy against him for $7,500; the paper has gone overdue fourteen days. He cites many other instances of the same character where this thing is being done, and probably it is because these bills repealing the bankrupt law are before the Congress of the United States that men desire to use this instrument of oppression, to take advantage of it before a law shall be passed preventing it from being done.

I only cite this one instance. I have perhaps fifty letters showing instances of almost precisely the same character, where oppression of this kind is being brought to bear against persons who are not bankrupts, against persons who are able to pay, but who, because of the stringency of the times, have failed to pay at the maturity of their paper. I have appeals made day after day through letters to me—inasmuch as I introduced one of the bills before the Senate, and I suppose that is the reason why I have received those letters, asking that some action be taken by the Congress of the United States in order to protect the people from this oppression, and this destruction of their property and their interests.

I do hope, without alluding to other matters that are of equally great importance before the Congress of the United States, that under the circumstances which surround us now, as the representatives of a great people, as we are, that we shall forego the pleasure of a holiday, for one year at least, in order to attend to the duties that are now pressing upon us.

Mr. HAMLIN. This practice of adjourning during the holidays is really one of a recent date. I remember well for long years when we adjourned at Christmas for two days without asking any concurrent vote, coming within the limitations of the Constitution, each House adjourning for the time named; but subsequently we have taken a longer recess—I think for some six or eight days—but requiring a concurrent vote to effect the adjournment; and now at this period of time, when, if there ever was one since we have been a Government where we are demanded to be here, it is prolonged to eighteen days. We have departed from the earlier, and, I think, the better, practice of the Government by taking a recess, and have got it to the point now where we are asked to adjourn for the term of eighteen days.

Every Senator will act upon his own responsibility and upon his own judgment; but for myself, occupying the position that I do and entertaining the opinions I do of the emergency of the times, I should consider it little less than a public crime for myself to vote for an adjournment over at this time. I do not enumerate the subjects of legislation, because they have been enumerated, and they are known not only to us, but they are known through all the broad land.

I regret that my esteemed and worthy friend from Minnesota has fallen by the wayside. Time after time we have voted together; and I want to take occasion to say that I never voted for one of these concurrent resolutions when there was business of much less importance than now before the Senate. I regret that my worthy friend has fallen by the wayside; but it is not all regret with me. I can congratulate myself when I am sustained by such other friends as the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Indiana, who have come to what I think is the wisest course of action now.

I think, Mr. President, that the exigencies of the times demand that we should remain here and try to do the duties that appropriately belong to us, and, so believing, I shall vote against any recess at all.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I cannot say that I had fully determined in my own mind, when I made the motion, whether I should actually vote for the recess or not. If I were really in doubt upon that subject, the speeches which I have heard would tend very far to convince me that I ought not to vote for it. Certainly, these speeches, coming from gentlemen with whom I have always acted, in opposing this motion for a recess, have very great influence with me; and yet, sir, I am as well satisfied as I was a moment ago that this recess will be taken. The only point which I made in my first remarks on the subject was that, if the recess is to be taken, we may as well know it to-day as to wait until the day after to-morrow to know it. If we fix the time for the recess commencing on next Friday, I have no doubt that the bill of my honorable friend from Maine, which probably will not occupy an hour's time, can be taken up and passed, and if the Judiciary Committee are ready to report the bankrupt bill, that that may also be acted upon.

Now, sir, as to some of the arguments against this adjournment which, as I said, have weight upon my mind, I desire to say that I think Senators who will remember how business has been done generally when we have attempted to keep Congress together during the holidays will not be anxious that these important questions should be considered at that time. The Senator from Indiana says that we all know there is a necessity for financial legislation. We do, Mr. President; at least some of us think we do; but we know equally well that there will be no important financial legislation during these days fixed for a recess. Whether the custom be a good one or not, it is a usage which has almost become a law at this Capitol, that during the ten days or two weeks which precede and follow Christmas and New-Year's we take a recess. Members and Senators come here with that usage full in view and make their arrangements to go home during that time. I am not going home; I do not desire to leave here personally; but, by the order of the Senate, I shall do so on business of the Senate, if we take a recess; but, personally, I have no desire on the subject further than that we may settle this question to-day and know whether we are to take a recess or not, and it seems to me that now is the proper time to take the vote.

It has been said that we propose to take a recess for sixteen days, and we are told of important measures pending. They are important. The most important of them that could be acted upon before the 1st of January can be disposed of before the recess. Why, sir, even during the war, in 1861, when our capital was beleaguered by the enemy and we were within sound of their guns, we took a recess of from fourteen to sixteen days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was the reason, I am afraid. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINDOM. I refer to that, not for the purpose of showing that we ought to do it now, but for the purpose of showing that we shall do it now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In order to test the sense of the Senate upon the propriety of taking a recess at the present time at any rate, if it is agreeable to gentlemen, I move to lay this motion upon the table, or I am perfectly willing to take it up and take a straight vote upon it.

Mr. MORTON and others. Let us take a straight vote upon it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Gentlemen say let the resolution be taken up. Well, let it be taken up. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say a word in regard to this matter. I feel the embarrassment in which the honorable Senator from Minnesota is placed in regard to this resolution. He is ordered by a vote of the Senate to go to New Orleans to examine, with the committee of which he is chairman, various routes of internal transportation. He necessarily has to make arrangements beforehand in order to go if it is the pleasure of the Senate that he should go. That depends entirely on whether a recess is ordered. It is therefore very natural, whatever may be his opinion about the question of the propriety of taking a recess, that he should ask the Senate to decide that question now, since it is manifest that preparations are necessary to be made by each member of that committee. I am a member of that committee, and I have agreed, if the committee go, to go along with them to discharge that public duty in obedience to the order of the Senate; and yet it is my conviction that Congress ought not to adjourn at the present time. I think we are laboring under some difficulties which we may have to meet before the 5th of January next. We not only have bills pending before us of the highest importance which we ought to act upon before we adjourn, but the condition of public affairs is now so uncertain in regard to many matters, or at least two or three matters, that I think it would be wise for Congress to be in session during the next two or three weeks. Therefore, though I have agreed to go with the committee to the Southern States, depending upon the adjournment of Congress, I feel that Congress ought to relieve the Senator from Minnesota from the uncertainty as to his going, by deciding this question now.

I shall vote against the passage of this resolution on the ground that the presence of Congress here is required now for the disposition of at least two or three important bills, and because of the possibility that we may be called upon to pass on other subjects which cannot be postponed until the second week in January. I shall, therefore, vote against the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, my vote on this proposition will depend very much upon what I can understand to be the intention of the Senate, when the vote shall be taken on the motion as it now stands. I am exceedingly anxious that the question shall be disposed of and settled finally, and that it will be so understood when we take the vote. Now, if we shall vote down the proposition to proceed to the consideration of the concurrent resolution, and it can be brought up at any time subsequently, and it shall not be understood that the vote we now take is decisive of the question, I decidedly prefer to take up the resolution and now dispose of it.

Mr. MORTON. It is taken up by consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe all hands agree that we shall take it up and have a square vote.

Mr. WRIGHT. I believe that is the better way myself; but I wish to say, now that I have the floor, that while I have business which is to myself very important, calling on me to leave the Capitol and go home, I feel that my duty as a representative of my people is here. I feel that here is my highest duty, and so it seems to me it is of every member of this body.

It does not make any difference, in my view, particularly whether we have important financial questions, the bankrupt law, or any other questions of special importance, before us at this time; we are here to legislate for the people. If we have not any duties to perform that are important, let us adjourn, go home, and stay there. If we have duties that are important to be performed, let us remain here and perform those duties, and when performed go home and stay there. I see no more necessity for adjourning now than for adjourning at any other time, nor so much. If I was left to my own judgment upon this subject, I would say remain here until about the 1st of March, about the middle of the term, and then, if we feel in view of the time we have been here that it is important that we should have a recess for rest, take it then, but not now. I think if you come to the questions that are before the Senate, there has been no time perhaps in all the history of the Government when it was so important that we should remain each day and work faithfully and honestly in the discharge of the duties that are before us, not adjourning from to-morrow until Monday, but working each day of the week that is required of us.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, I have but little to say on the subject. I cannot agree entirely with what the Senator from Iowa has just delivered as his views to the Senate, for I think from the present indications that the people are never so happy as when we are away from here. [Laughter.] Therefore I shall vote for the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to proceed to the consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, the 19th instant, they adjourn to meet again on Tuesday, the 6th of January next, at twelve o'clock noon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to postpone the consideration of the resolution indefinitely; and on that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves the indefinite postponement of the resolution, and calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WINDOM. I only want to ask—not to argue the question—that this may be considered a test vote as to whether we take any recess during the holidays.

Mr. MORTON. I hope so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I made the motion with that view.

Mr. ANTHONY. It may be considered a test question, but it cannot bind anybody but those who make it a test.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 37, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Crozier, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pratt, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sumner, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Clayton, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Hitchcock, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Stockton, and Tipton—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Flanagan, Gordon, Jones, Patterson, Schurz, Sprague, and Stewart—8.

So the resolution was indefinitely postponed.

ALLOWANCE TO WIDOW OF JOHN M. MORRIS.

Mr. DENNIS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reported without amendment the following resolution, which had been referred to the committee on the 11th instant:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to the widow of John M. Morris, deceased, late executive clerk of the Senate, $150 for his funeral expenses, and a further allowance equal to two months of his annual pay.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

REPEAL OF BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now move to proceed to the consideration of the so-called bankrupt bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 792) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe my motion is pending—to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending motion is that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN. The observations made by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] this morning struck me with great force, but I will not resist the motion. The Senator from Vermont is aware of the great anxiety to have action on the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg my honorable friend from Ohio to believe me that I have as great anxiety as he has that we shall modify and arrange this law so that it will be useful instead of injurious, if it be injurious to any part of the country, and that the greatest possible diligence will be used by the committee in considering it. The Senator is perfectly aware, of course, that we have other subjects which have been referred to us that we have been obliged to pay some attention to; but the earliest thing that we shall do of a legislative character, I hope, will be that of considering this bill and reporting very speedily—within two or three days at the furthest.

Mr. MORTON. I am very anxious to have speedy action upon this bankrupt bill. Now, as we have indefinitely postponed the resolution from the House for a recess, and are likely to stay here until next week, and I hope the most of the week, I shall vote for the motion to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the understanding stated by the chairman, that it shall be speedily reported back. I hope we shall get it back here to-morrow, and that we may act on it to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In honor to my friend, and in truth, I cannot say that we can certainly get it back to morrow, because we are pressed with a matter now under consideration; but I hope we shall get it back by the next day certainly. The Senate may feel assured that the bill, so far as any action of mine can bring it about, will be reported by Friday morning. It may be reported by Thursday, but I cannot have it understood that I shall agree to report it by Thursday, although I hope we may.

Mr. MORTON. I will simply say, in addition to what I have said, that I hope we shall get the bill to-morrow, or at furthest the next, morning; and I think there is an understanding now in the Senate (and I shall vote for the reference upon that understanding) that this Congress will take no recess until the bankrupt bill has been acted on by both Houses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I agree to most heartily.

Mr. MORTON. That is the understanding.

Mr. ANTHONY. I take it that does not bind everybody else. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Indiana, having come to that agreement, it is of course satisfactory to them, and nobody would be so unreasonable as not to be satisfied. [Laughter.] Nevertheless, I venture to make this remark: The vote taken a short time ago upon the resolution to adjourn evidently exerts much influence upon this matter. I think, from the indications earlier in the day, it would have been the pleasure of the Senate to retain in its own control the House bill, by leaving it lie on the table, accessible at any time. Now, the Senator from Indiana, for example, moved apparently by the fact that the Senate has refused to concur in adjourning over the holidays, says he will vote for a reference to the Judiciary Committee. Certainly I do not want to prolong the time before the Judiciary Committee is to get charge of this bill, but simply to say that my own judgment still is that the friends of some amendment at least of the bankrupt law had better keep the staff in their own hands. I do not believe a reference of this bill to the Judiciary Committee will facilitate the action of that committee upon this subject.

I will add, to be entirely frank, that another reason why I shall not vote for it is that I do not consider as well founded as the Rock of Ages, by any means, the decision not to adjourn over the holidays. I shall not be at all surprised if another resolution comes here from the House of Representatives. I am myself opposed to a holiday recess. I cannot, however, shut my eyes to the fact that the Constitution commits to the House and not to us the duty of originating revenue measures. One bill has been referred to by my honorable friend from Maine, upon which there is plenty of time to act. Should action be taken upon that bill, and we be left without any measure from the House relating to finances to act upon, and with the House reiterating again its judgment that there had better be an adjournment, perhaps for the reason that its Committee on Appropriations or its Committee on Ways and Means may during the recess be better able to advance measures for presentation to the House than they could do with the session continuing, I do not know by what authority any Senator can affirm from the record just made that the Senate, fuller than it is to-day or not so full, may not reverse the vote by which an indefinite postponement has fallen upon a resolution to adjourn.

I only say, Mr. President, that I still think it would be more prudent to keep the House bill where it is; and yet I am not going to wrestle at all with the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, or with other gentlemen whose attention has been drawn to the subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should be sorry to have Senators suppose that my honorable friend from New York has so small faith in the honor and integrity of the committee of which he is one of the chief members, as we all know, and which of course in some measure includes himself, when he says anything which reflects upon that committee—I say I should be sorry to suppose that his faith in that committee was so small that he would not trust it, according to the evident desire of the Senate, to make a prompt report upon any matter sent to it; and therefore I must suppose that my honorable friend does not mean that, and that he does believe that the committee of which he is a member will endeavor to conform itself to the wishes of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. If my honorable friend will allow me, I think he may well believe that, inasmuch as I have not said or intimated anything to the contrary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. About that different people might have a different opinion. Out of some respect to the committee itself, inasmuch as I beg Senators to understand that they all have it in their power to move to discharge us at any moment and bring the bill back again before the Senate, (which has sometimes been done, as we know,) out of knowledge of that fact, and out of the ordinary respect that is paid to committees, and which if it cannot be paid to this one it had better be discharged and a fresh one made, I think that this bill, one important in its details if it is to be amended, one important in the little details that it contains now to be carefully scrutinized, should be sent to this committee as the finance bills are sent to the Finance Committee, important as they are, and the appropriation and the deficiency bills to the Committee on Appropriations.

I do not want to prolong this discussion. I only wish the Senate to see precisely how entirely this bill is as much in their power when it is in our hands as it is when it is on the table.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, if I thought that a refusal to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary involved any imputation upon that committee, or manifested any want of confidence in it, I should certainly be opposed to any such refusal and insist upon the reference. But I do not so consider it; on the contrary, the Senate has again and again manifested its confidence in the committee by sending to it at this very session divers bills and propositions upon this very subject. Nay, more; it sent a bill to that committee at the last session, and the committee considered it and reported that bill with a recommendation that it pass, and that was a bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law; in terms very nearly, in substance I believe quite the same as the bill which we have now received from the House of Representatives.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that the reasons for objecting to a reference of this bill to the committee do not involve at all any imputation either upon the committee or upon any member of it, for I am quite willing to bear witness that every member of that committee is anxious to act upon the subject and to act with promptness; but it may well be that when we come to consider the question in the committee with the various propositions that are before it or may come before it, the committee may not arrive at a conclusion in which a majority can concur, and we may therefore be delayed. It is for this reason that it seems to me that it is well enough to let this bill lie where it is. What practical difficulty is in the way? None at all. The subject is now before the Judiciary Committee. Suppose that committee, instead of recommending a repeal of the law, such as the bill from the House contemplates, should prefer to report amendments to the law depriving it of those features which have rendered it obnoxious and which make it oppressive, taking away the power to use the law as an instrument for levying blackmail, the worst feature in the whole law; suppose the committee should prefer to report amendments instead of an absolute repeal; what is the difficulty in reporting such amendments and instructing their chairman to move to take up this bill and then move the amendments as a substitute for the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the difficulty in doing that with all House bills? Why do you not treat all House bills in that same way?

Mr. THURMAN. There is a very great reason why it should not be done. This subject has been considered; this subject is now before the Judiciary Committee. To use the language of the Senator from New York, that committee has jurisdiction over it. It may very well, therefore, consider the propositions that are before it and bring in a substitute for this House bill, report it to the Senate, and let it be moved as a substitute for the House bill. We have substantially the same thing as this House bill already before us in a bill introduced, I believe, by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and referred to the committee; so that the very provisions of this House bill are already before the committee. There is no necessity, then, for sending this bill to the committee in order to give it jurisdiction over the subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator from New York will correct the Senator from Ohio in that statement. The bill of the Senator from New York is one much more like what has been suggested more or less formally here in debate by way of correction for the evils which have grown up.

Mr. THURMAN. I think it is a repeal of the law.

Mr. CONKLING. No; my friend will pardon me; it differs entirely from the House bill in the fact that the House bill does, and the bill I introduced does not, repeal the bankrupt law. The bill introduced by me is in general quite like that (if I may be allowed to refer to the House proceedings) reported in the House, and which an effort was made to pass, but which was defeated by a large vote, because it did not repeal the bankrupt act.

Mr. THURMAN. But the whole subject is before us, and we can report any measure that we see fit.

Mr. CONKLING. There are several bills before us presenting various propositions.

Mr. THURMAN. The bill introduced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] at the last session, and reported by the committee with a recommendation that it pass, is before us, if I am not mistaken. I think it has been introduced and referred to us at this very session. At all events, there are bills enough before us to give us complete jurisdiction over the subject.

What reason, then, is there for this exceptional mode, I grant, of proceeding; that is, keeping the bill here? Why, sir, I agree with the Senator from New York, that the indefinite postponement of the resolution to take a recess does not settle that matter, because we do not know but that after a day or two another resolution of the same sort may be introduced and passed. We have seen that thing done before. We have seen such resolutions defeated and afterward similar resolutions passed. Now, the reason why I want this bill to remain on the table is this: that it may be taken up; it has been read the second time; that it may be amended, if necessary, and that then it may be passed and sent to the House in time for the House to act upon it, if the House is determined on insisting upon a recess, or if the House should see fit to take the matter in its own hands, and adjourn of its own volition for the time permitted by the Constitution. Therefore, without having any particular feeling on the subject one way or the other, I do think the best thing we can do is to let the bill lie on the table here.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to say one or two words about this matter. I know but little of the merits of the existing bankrupt law. From the little I do know of it myself and from what little I know of the public estimation of it, I suppose if I am compelled to vote, or have an opportunity to vote, either to repeal or to retain the existing law, I shall vote as loud as my voice will permit to repeal that law. Nevertheless, I am of the opinion myself that a well-considered and well-digested bankrupt law is very nearly a necessity to every commercial and trading community. I think it is an honest measure in itself—not the existing law, but a good one. When a debtor is unable or unwilling to pay his debts, I think common honesty requires that his estate should be economically, if you please, but equally distributed among his creditors. That I suppose to be the aim of a bankrupt law; and I cannot help feeling that we are somewhat disgraced as legislators that, after two or three attempts, we have never yet been able to effect a bankrupt law with which the country would be content only until certain purposes had been accomplished.

If it be the deliberate judgment of the Senate that we will not prosecute the attempt to improve, to amend, to perfect the existing law, but that it shall be repealed, wiped from the statute-book—if that be the disposition of the Senate, I suppose we had better not refer this repealing bill to the Judiciary Committee, but we had better concur with the House in the passage of the bill. For myself, I am inclined to hope yet that the Judiciary Committee—if you will not hurry them, if you will not send this bill to them with instructions to bring it back to us to-morrow or the next day, if you will give them, in spite of the passion of this morning, a little time for consideration and deliberation—may, by good luck and great industry, return to us some modifications of the existing law which will make it more acceptable to the country, and may, perhaps, induce the two Houses to think that it is not necessary after all to send it adrift just at this moment. It is this hope, therefore, that induces me to vote for the reference of this bill to the Judiciary Committee.

Having occupied the floor so much, I desire to make another remark. I never, I think, since I have had the honor of a seat on that floor, have felt under such a weight of obligation for the great blessings of debate as I feel to-day. I was extremely obliged to the honorable Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] for moving the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution to adjourn over for the holidays, not because I cared at all whether the Senate agreed to it or disagreed to it, but because it furnished the occasion for rousing me from a sense of false security—torpidity, as my honorable friend from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] who always culls the very best words there are in the dictionary, and to whom I have often been under very deep obligations, suggests, [laughter]—I was about to say a sense of false security. I had seen the Senate meet here at twelve o'clock in the day occasionally, and sit an hour or two, and introduce quite a number of bills, and occasionally make a speech about some one of them, manifesting the utmost indifference as to which one of them the speech was upon, and then at a very early hour of the day adjourning; and all this had led me into a sort of feeling that the country was not in a state of dissolution; and I suppose I should have gone home to-night feeling in the same way if it had not been for the motion of my honorable friend from Minnesota. When he moved an adjournment for the holidays, and Senators so much better informed than myself took the floor on that great question, I saw at once how much deceived I had been, and I felt a regret that Wisconsin had not at that moment one on this floor who could join her voice to the invocation of this pious sisterhood who seemed called together, just at that time and without a moment's warning, to administer what seemed to be something like extreme unction to the country, [laughter.] I saw in a moment how much more wretched was the condition of the country than I had any idea of. So I felt under the heaviest obligation for that debate; and I am not under less obligation to this debate on the present question since I have been led to understand by the remarks of the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] and the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] that that debate, which opened my eyes to the extreme misery and suffering which pervade every part of this widespread Republic, and which demand the instant and incessant attention and labor of every one of us—that that exposition was only made to prepare the public mind to entertain another motion to adjourn over the holidays. [Laughter.]

So you see it is only through these debates that I am getting acquainted both with the actual condition of the country and with the very subterranean reasons why that exposition of the condition of the country is made known just at this particular time.

Mr. President, I do not propose to indicate how I shall vote when that new resolution of adjournment comes. I shall listen again either to the new speeches that may be made on that occasion, or I shall reread those that have been made to-day. I shall vote for the motion to refer.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I do not rise to make a speech on this question, but to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that I intend to make a motion, if we can dispose of the pending matter, to take up the naval appropriation bill, and simply to say that it seems to me this bill ought to pass from the consideration of the Senate on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, as a matter of course. The idea of the bill lying upon the table to await the action of the Committee on the Judiciary in the consideration of the precise subject, when this is the only action the House have had upon it, strikes me as a most extraordinary proposition; and the only suggestion that I have heard comes from two gentlemen, themselves on the committee, and that is, that it is a strategic movement; that there may be a great advantage in having this bill lie upon the table while the committee are considering the general subject, because this is precise in its character; we know exactly what it is; it is a repeal, nothing more, nothing less; and that by some possibility we may adjourn in some unwitting day or hour, although we have now determined that we will not adjourn at all, and therefore for that reason it had better lie upon the table where it can be accessible to the Senate.

Mr. President, I submit that is a little too fine, and the Senate ought to act in harmony with its general usage and not entertain this exceptional motion, but allow the committee of the Senate to have under consideration the whole subject, both as it has been considered by the committee and as it has been considered by the House of Representatives, to the end that they may have the advantage of the opinions of the House—if I have a right to refer to the action of the House in the consideration of that subject. But I pray most especially and most fervently that this subject may pass from the attention of the Senate, so that I may invite its attention to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, which I hope I will get an opportunity to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTRAORDINARY NAVAL EXPENSES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 481, making appropriations for extraordinary expenses of the naval service.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which proposes to appropriate the following sums to meet extraordinary expenses in the naval service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874:

For pay of the Navy, $300,000.
For contingent expenses of the Navy Department, $25,000.
For the Bureau of Navigation, $20,000.
For the Bureau of Ordnance, $500,000.
For the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, $500,000.
For the Bureau of Yards and Docks, $20,000.
For the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, $300,000.
For the Bureau of Steam Engineering, $335,000.
For the Bureau of Construction and Repair, $2,000,000.

The bill further provides that these appropriations may be, in case of necessity to pay expenses already incurred and contracted for, transferred from one Bureau to another by special order of the President; which orders, with the reason therefor, are to be communicated to Congress whenever the good of the public service will permit.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I assume, Mr. President, that the Senate are familiar, if not with the details of this bill, with the general subject out of which the bill grows, it having been passed by the House of Representatives and considered there. If any explanation is required, I will send a communication from the Secretary of the Navy to the desk that it may be read; otherwise, I will make no remark upon it.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to ask my friend whether this is to meet what has already been done, past expenses or future expenses?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It exclusively applies to what has been done—moneys actually expended and contracted to be expended.

Mr. SUMNER. No part of this appropriation is to be applied to anything in the future?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. Because I certainly am ready to run the line very clearly and very distinctly. I am against the appropriation of another dollar in any such direction.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The committee have carefully restrained themselves from recommending anything to the Senate beyond what was originally contained in the bill. It relates to such expenditures as have been made in the several Bureaus in the Navy Department in fitting out certain vessels and contracts made for such repairs.

Mr. SUMNER. I am not disposed to discuss the question of these moneys already expended. Probably some time will come when it may be proper to inquire into these expenditures. I regret, myself, that they were made; most sincerely I regret it; but I shall say nothing about them now. The facts are not yet before the country to enable us to discuss them adequately; but I feel it my duty to declare most distinctly that these expenditures ought to stop at this hour and this minute—not a dollar more in that direction. I think it has been an ill-omened expenditure, and at this moment, when our expenditures are so large and our revenue comparatively so small, it is much to be regretted.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask to have the communication from the Secretary of the Navy read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 8, 1873.

SIR: Under the circumstances of the present emergency, I am compelled to ask that a special appropriation be made to cover the expenses of putting the iron-clad and cruising Navy of the United States in condition for immediate and active service.

I have taken measures to put every available iron and wooden ship of our Navy in condition for immediate duty.

I have ordered all the ships of the various squadrons within reach to rendezvous at Key West. I am enlisting men to supply and fill up the crews of all our vessels. I have accumulated materials, provisions, and supplies for their maintenance and support; and ordnance, ammunition, and all the weapons of naval warfare for their use.

The circumstances which have constrained the Department to this unusual activity and consequent expenditure are known to you and to the country. The fact that they occurred during the recess of Congress made it necessary that I should myself assume the responsibility of prompt action, relying upon the wisdom and justice of the people and their representatives for support.

I have not as yet exceeded the appropriation for the current year, but these measures, with the cost of preparing, transporting, and concentrating everything necessary to carry them out, have already almost exhausted the money of the working Bureaus of the Department, and these must be supplied at once if the work is to go on.

The cost of putting our iron-clads in condition for service (a work already undertaken and in some instances far advanced) will also require a large immediate appropriation. The amount required to reimburse the Bureaus, so as to carry them through the year, and also to put all our available monitors in order, will be not less than $4,000,000.

If our force is to be increased, or if the powerful double-turreted monitors Miantonomah, Monadnock, and Puritan are to be put in a condition of usefulness, at least $1,000,000 more will be required.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am not disposed to find fault with the Secretary of the Navy or with the President of the United States for expending four million dollars under the circumstances that grew out of the Virginius affair. When I came to Washington last month it was manifest to every one that the affair was a very serious matter. From the excited state of the public mind in Cuba, from the pride of the Spanish people, and from the determination on the part of our Government, as well as the determination on the part of our people to have some satisfaction growing out of the capture of the Virginius, matters did look serious. Therefore, the executive authorities were bound in the performance of the plainest duty to use all the means in their power to protect and strengthen the Navy, and to put our available forces in such a position that they could be used, if necessary. But I think by the wisdom, by the prudence, and by the care of the Secretary of State chiefly, approved and sanctioned by the Executive, we have escaped all danger of a complication with Spain, and the Virginius matter is entirely settled. Therefore, all that we ought to do, and all we can do, is to pay the money that was properly expended to prepare for an emergency that has passed away, and that should be the end of it; and I would not have said one word in regard to this bill but that I wish to caution the Senate, and if my voice will reach the Secretary of the Navy, and those having charge of these expenditures, to say to them in all candor that here the expenditure ought to cease. This Virginius affair has happily passed away. The money that has been expended on these vessels is not lost, but for such objects future expenditure ought to cease, and the expenditure of all money not absolutely necessary to maintain the Navy in its present condition, or in the condition contemplated by Congress at the last session, should cease.

I make this remark, too, in view of another bill reported here to-day. It was proposed to seize upon the controversy with regard to the Virginius to raise the numerical force of the Navy from 8,500 to 10,000 men. It was fixed at 8,500, after a long debate in the Senate and after full consideration, with some opposing ideas; and now it is proposed, either in consequence of the Virginius affair or for the purpose of carrying out the idea of a minority some years ago, that we shall advance the numerical force of the Navy from 8,500 to 10,000 men.

Mr. CRAGIN. Will the Senator allow me to correct a wrong impression? The proposition to increase is only temporary—for one year.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that originally it was meant as a permanent increase, but it was amended so as to be temporary and to expire in a year or two hence. But if it is a temporary increase it must have grown out of a temporary exigency. That temporary exigency has passed away. If the increase is voted at this session of Congress, it will be a permanent increase, because we know how difficult it is to reduce the force either of the Army or the Navy when it is once established. Now, I call the attention of the Senate to remember that, while both Houses of Congress have been prompt and willing to sustain the executive authorities in doing what has been done to protect the honor of the Government, and to guard ourselves against contingencies, that feeling ought not to be made the occasion of any increase in our naval expenditures.

I am reminded by the existence of the facts by which we are surrounded now with the strange similitude of historical example. His tory but repeats itself. In 1857 we had almost precisely the same state of affairs, running in a striking parallel with what we have now. My friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] will remember that on the 3d day of March, 1857, we passed a bill largely reducing taxes; we passed a bill commonly known, I believe, as the Campbell bill, by which the tariff duties, then the only taxes levied by the Government of the United States, were reduced nearly 20 per cent. We authorized the payment of the outstanding public debt at any price, and the Secretary of the Treasury who came into office after the 4th of March, 1857, actually paid 16 to 17 per cent. premium on the public debt, bought in the months of April and May, 1857. We passed at that time the heaviest appropriation bills that up to that time had ever been passed. We appropriated more money for the erection of new public buildings in the sessions of 1856 and 1857 than had ever been passed before. It was a democratic administration, in democratic times, all branches of the Government being under the control of the democratic party; and yet when we came back in December, 1857, the very first act which passed Congress was a bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes. Our revenues had disappeared; there was a deficiency within thirty days after the failure of the Ohio Trust Company, in New York; and when we came back to Congress we were met with an urgent demand from the President of the United States to provide for the temporary exigency, and the first bill that was passed at that session of Congress was a bill to authorize Treasury notes, and that was soon followed by a loan act, the same loan the redemption of which we have provided for by a bill which received your signature, Mr. President, to-day.

We are in the same condition now that we were then; but I believe that it is a temporary state of affairs. I am not disposed to make any statement that would alarm even the most timid, because I do not think there is occasion for it. We have met with one of those strange periodical panics, the causes of which seem to differ so much, but which are almost regular in their coming, like the locusts, the plague, the cholera, or something of that kind. Men may reason about them, but they come almost regularly. We have met and are now in the midst of one of those panics, and are likely to go through the same course of treatment as heretofore. It is manifest that under these circumstances it is the duty of the Executive Departments to economize in every branch of their expenditures. This extraordinary appropriation that we are called upon to meet now ought not to be made the occasion of any increased expenditure in the Navy Department or any other Department of the Government.

A very common idea prevails in the Executive Departments that when Congress appropriates money for a particular purpose it is a mandatory appropriation; that they must expend the money; that they have no option; as if an appropriation is made for the erection of a public building, they have no power to say that the building ought not to be erected. That is not the law. That is not the theory of our Government at all. When an appropriation is made for any purpose whatever, unless it be to carry into execution an existing law, as to pay salaries or the like, or where the law has made a contract, the appropriation never is mandatory, but is simply permissive. There were twenty or thirty million dollars of appropriations made at the last session of Congress, of which at least one-half, perhaps more than one-half, has not yet been expended, and which in my judgment ought to be promptly arrested. There were appropriations that depend entirely on the pleasure of the Government passed at the last session of Congress amounting to forty of fifty million dollars—appropriations for fortifications, for rivers and harbors, for public works, and for various other purposes, which are merely permissive; and there is, therefore, no question of the power of the executive authority to arrest the expenditure of public money under them, unless where contracts have been made in pursuance of law.

It is, therefore, manifestly the duty of the Government at this time to go on and adopt a system of economy. I remember in 1857, to carry out the parallel a little further, the republican party, then a struggling party, although in the minority, held the administration of Mr. Buchanan to a rigid accountability in public expenditures. I know that the committees of the House of Representatives, although the House of Representatives was then democratic, were organized with a view to promote economy in public expenditures, and we did require the administration of Mr. Buchanan to cut down all expenditures as preliminary to the passage of loan bills and other measures of relief. While the republicans of that day came forward and, without raising any party question or even any party allusion, promptly voted to the administration of Mr. Buchanan the authority to issue Treasury notes and promptly passed a loan bill, yet in connection with that they, as a minority, demanded that the administration should observe due economy and should reduce all the expenses of the Government.

I do not believe that such a demand need now be made on the Executive; and yet the times in which we are demand that the executive authorities should perform this duty. I shall not object at all if our democratic adversaries here should do the duty of a minority, and should require and hold the Government up to a rigid discharge of this duty of economy. Why, sir, the sweeping away of private fortunes, the destruction of capital, the destruction of values, that occurred in the single month of September last was enormous. It is said that, in regard to one man, he held so large an amount of securities that the shrinkage of values was over twenty million dollars. I do not know whether that be so or not; but the statement is made, and I have no doubt it is correct, that the shrinkage of values on the stocks quoted in the daily sales in New York amounted to over one hundred million dollars—an immense sum. But the immediate effect has been good. Everybody is economizing; every man, whatever may be his condition, whatever may be his circumstances, has at once adapted his expenditures to the exigency of the case. There is no one here on the floor, there is not a citizen who has not felt, more or less, the necessity of economy. What has been the result? Our importations have fallen off enormously. Last month, for the first time for many years, our exports exceeded, even on the gold value, our imports. Our importations have fallen off enormously, and our revenues have fallen off correspondingly.

Why, sir, last month we increased the public debt over nine million dollars. What was that caused by? Not by any increase in expenditure, except so far as it was affected by these disbursements for the Navy. It was caused by the shrinkage of our revenue. During the present month we know from an official document that has been communicated to the House of Representatives that the deficiency will probably be not less than from ten to twelve million dollars.

It is manifest that in this condition of affairs it is the duty of all branches of the Government, first, to economize; to do what every private citizen in the country is compelled to do; to stop every kind of expenditure not rigidly demanded by law and the public necessities; to stop for a time all improvements that can be postponed to some better day; and then, in addition to that, if the times shall demand it, if the case shall require it, we must borrow for the time being to tide over the difficulties under which we are laboring, and if that is not sufficient, or if that is not deemed a wise policy, then, as a matter of course, we must increase the taxes upon the people.

I believe now that the panic which prevailed in September and October has passed away, in a great measure, among the people. Nearly all the ordinary course of business has resumed; the prices of commodities to-day are as high as they were before the panic, with the single exception of the article of cotton. All the great products of the West are now sold in money at a little higher price than they commanded before the panic; cotton alone is the exception. So that the difficulty has passed away in a great measure, among the people. The Government alone is now suffering from the effects of the panic by new wants partly caused by this extraordinary expenditure for the Navy, but chiefly by the shrinkage of our revenue.

Mr. President, I am sorry to have detained the Senate even with these remarks at this late hour. While I shall vote for this appropriation bill, I, for one, as a member of the dominant party here, feeling myself responsible with all the others of that party for the expenditures of the Government and the management of the Government, shall deem that my duty is not performed unless I examine with the utmost scrutiny and with the utmost care every proposed expenditure, every appropriation bill that is offered, and I believe that it is our duty carefully to limit the expenditures, not only within the law, but below the permissive laws that we passed at the last session of Congress.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Mr. President, I cannot, with my responsibilities as a representative, vote for this proposition without knowing something more about it. This is an appropriation of $4,000,000, and for what? The honorable Senator from Ohio said that we ought to examine into the proposition and know precisely to what our money is applied. Is there a single item before this body which shows how this $4,000,000 could have been expended in one month or two months?

Gentlemen who are in favor of this bill clamor for its passage because the money is required. Why required? We gave to this Department at the last session $20,000,000 for the current year. Where is the Navy? They profess that they have one; they profess that they have five squadrons on the high seas; they profess to have a North Atlantic and a South Atlantic squadron. Furthermore, but one year ago the Secretary of the Navy announced to this House that the Navy was then more efficient than it had been the year before. We expended then $22,000,000 upon the Navy, and now we are told that we have no Navy. We are called upon to expend $4,000,000 more, making our appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, amount to $25,000,000, and yet it is said we have no Navy. What has been done? Where are the vessels? What should twenty millions of money command? A Navy sufficient to put down this miserable eruption that agitated the country for about a month. Here we are asked for $4,000,000 more without an item, and the $20,000,000 are gone!

Talk not to me about republican economy or democratic economy. I may have contracted notions about these matters; but it strikes me that it is time for us to accustom ourselves a little to the idea of seeing some return for our money. So far as I am concerned, until public attention is called to this branch of the subject, I shall not vote one dollar of taxes. Cut down expenditures before you undertake to tax; and I am glad to see, if I am permitted to speak about the action of the House of Representatives, that that body is inquiring into a reduction of expenditures, and properly inquiring, before voting for additional taxes.

Why, Mr. President, allow me to call your attention to the report of the Secretary of the Navy one year ago. In that report he says that upon the North Atlantic station he has 77 guns and 11 vessels, and upon the South Atlantic 3 vessels and 23 guns. I do not suppose it is within the comprehension of any Senator here that more guns than that were required to put down this recent eruption that amounted to nothing in fact, and no rational man ever contemplated that it would amount to anything. There is not a responsible human being on this floor that ever contemplated that that matter could result in anything serious to either government—that there could be any such crime committed against civilization as that Spain and America should enter into hostilities upon that subject-matter. But the Secretary of the Navy now tells us that he has expended three or four million dollars to meet that emergency. It is an item in these days; but four million is nothing for this body to vote, and vote without debate, when he had twenty millions appropriated for this year and a large portion of it ought to be unexpended at this time.

Instead of voting these four millions in addition to the twenty millions, let him retrench, cut down his expenditures, and see whether he cannot save enough by the expiration of the fiscal year to save the three or four millions that he has thus unauthorizedly, or probably authorizedly, expended. I do not care much how he spends the money, so that it is toward the Navy and so that he does not exceed our appropriations. That is what we ask the Secretary of the Navy to do. As I understand, the Secretary of the Navy has said that he has not expended a dollar beyond the appropriations made in the last year.

Two squadrons we have there, and after enumerating the number of vessels we had in service, sufficient for all practical purposes I am sure, he said this in his report of last year:

> This shows an active force slightly increased in strength since the date of the last report, with improved efficiency on account of its better distribution in a greater number of smaller and more active vessels.

The application to Congress has been for small vessels, not to prepare this country with large ones for the purpose of competition in war with other nations, but active cruisers. We voted three or four millions for the construction of six at the last session of Congress. Whether they are to be of consequence in the contemplated raid to be made either on Spain or any other foreign power which our aggressive spirit, as we have plenty of money, and can command any amount of men, may inspire us in the future, I do not know anything about. But I am opposed in limine to this idea of having what he calls an active navy. Listen to him in his recent report:

> I felt it to be my duty under existing circumstances to take promptly every means in my power to put our available force in the best possible condition for immediate and active service.

And in the same report the Secretary of the Navy says he intends to continue in that line. Mr. President, if it takes $20,000,000 of money to keep no navy, as it is claimed we have none, what will it do to keep an active navy in the service? Why, where are your revenues and where are your tax laws?

Mr. President, for one I protest against the whole thing. I shall vote against the bill and every other like bill that may be presented to this body. I shall vote against an increase of taxes until we have a reduction of expenditures, and when the bill shall pass I would prefer that a committee of this body be appointed for the purpose of inquiring particularly into the expenditure of this vast amount of money.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I move to strike out of this bill, on page 2, lines 24 to 29, inclusive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be stricken out by the amendment of the Senator from Vermont will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the bill by striking out the following words:

> And the appropriations herein made may be, in case of necessity to pay expenses already incurred and contracted for, transferred from one Bureau to another, by special order of the President; which orders, with the reason therefor, shall be communicated to Congress whenever the good of the public service will permit.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I regard the conduct of the Administration in this affair of the Virginius as entirely creditable. I think it redounds as much to their honor as any act of the Administration. I am willing to vote for all the sums of money that may be needed for expenses that have been actually incurred or that may have been contracted for, and are therefore necessary. I had hoped that to-day, when the Virginius was to be surrendered, would obviate the necessity of expending so large a sum as is asked for here; but at all events I regard it as particularly dangerous and objectionable to depart from the ordinary rules and regulations by which we prescribe our appropriations. We have for many years appropriated in detail, but now this bill with these last lines in it amounts to a lump sum. You might just as well appropriate $4,000,000 to the Navy and not say a word about it, as to have that last proviso in the bill; and there is no necessity for it, because Congress is in session. If there are any of these items upon which the Secretary of the Navy shall find that he needs a larger sum, all he has to do is to report the facts to Congress. We shall be in session and can remedy it.

I therefore hope that no bill of so loose a character as this will be suffered to pass the Senate of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, this bill originates in an exigency so generally known to the country and so generally understood, as I had supposed, by members of Congress, that it should not be deemed particularly important that in reporting it we should go very much into detail; but the remarks of the honorable Senator from Maryland seem to render it necessary, perhaps, that I should state something in regard to the character of the expenditures for the Navy out of which this bill has arisen.

Those who are familiar at all with the Navy of the United States know that it is at the present time in a very dilapidated and inefficient condition. We had some slight discussion of that subject at the last session of Congress, in which, if I mistake not, the honorable Senator from Maryland participated somewhat in the same line of remarks that he has indulged in to-day, feeling then, as now, that there was likely never to be an exigency where any portion of the Navy of the United States would be at all desirable; that the days of peace had dawned upon the earth; and that our position was of such a character that we never need expect any complication to arise with foreign nations or any disturbance of an exterior character which might lead to the use of a Navy, the honorable Senator seemed to consider quite out of the question; and that arose on an attempt to appropriate two or three millions, I think $3,000,000, with a view of increasing the strength of the Navy.

Well, now, Mr. President, the honorable Senator does not raise the question whether the Government acted promptly, fitly, or not, in the exigency which was upon us. I will not go into that at this time. My own belief about it is that we were saved from a war by the judicious conduct and treatment of this whole subject by the executive department of the Government—and a war with Spain, a little brush, as the Senator says, that nobody apprehended. Why, Mr. President, that honorable Senator undervalues Spain as a naval power very much. Spain has a large naval force in Cuba, and has had these past three months. In the condition of the Navy at the time when war was menaced and we had every reason to apprehend it, we were certainly quite unprepared; and my own judgment and belief is that the energy displayed by the Secretary of the Navy in putting the Navy in a position as well as he could for war was a very important fact inducing to peace.

Now, for the information of the Senator from Maryland as well as the Senate, I will state a specification of some of the objects for which this money has been expended. The Secretary has given the list of vessels ordered to be got ready for sea since November 9, 1873. These foot up 32 in number. The names of them are given—some wooden, some monitors; and the sum estimated for the repair of each. That amounts to $2,104,000. In addition to that are the sums taken from the different Bureaus; from the Bureau of Steam Engineering, $508,000; and estimates from the other Bureaus amounting in all to the sum of $4,000,000.

All this has been taken from the appropriations for the current year made for the expenditures in these Bureaus. In this exigency the Secretary had no authority to borrow money or to go outside for money. He therefore, in this extraordinary emergency, drew upon the several Bureaus in his Department on the ordinary expenditures; and it is, it will be seen, to supply these Bureaus that this appropriation is made; first, "for the pay of the Navy, $300,000." That is to meet the extra expenditure for the recruiting of the 1,500 men which are provided for by the bill reported by the Senator from New Hampshire this morning. Next, "for the contingent expenses of the Navy Department, $25,000;" "for the Bureau of Navigation, $20,000," drawn upon in this emergency; "for the Bureau of Ordnance, $500,000;" "for the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, $500,000;" "for the Bureau of Yards and Docks, $20,000;" "for the Bureau of Steam Engineering, $300,000;" "for the Bureau of Construction and Repair," because on this Bureau came the very great burden, "$2,000,000."

Now, one word in regard to the motion of the honorable Senator from Vermont. I agree with him that, as a general proposition, it is not well to authorize the Department to draw from the appropriation in one Bureau to be expended in another; but it seemed to the committee that inasmuch as these extraordinary appropriations were necessary to be drawn from these Bureaus indiscriminately, and as the appropriation is made to relieve these Bureaus, it was absolutely necessary that there should be some discretion somewhere for the redistribution of the funds so appropriated to those several Bureaus, and without regard to the sums specifically appropriated.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope the Senator from Maine will allow the amendment I have proposed to pass without objection. I am sure that he, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, cannot be disposed to have an example set of so wide a departure from all the practice of the Senate. Even our ordinary appropriations that have been made heretofore for these different Bureaus are specified; they are itemized under the different Bureaus. Now, here is a proposition that professes to itemize, and yet at the last end it comes in and provides that it may all in gross sum be appropriated anyhow and anywhere. I am sure the Senator cannot object to the amendment which I propose, and I am also equally sure that it will be at once accepted by the House without any discussion or debate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If I was certain it would not lead to embarrassment, of course I should not object to the amendment, because the Senator well understands the importance I have always attached to this particular provision of the law which prohibits transfers. I am not certain, I do not feel confident at all, that embarrassment would arise, but I find the clause here——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It can be relieved by Congress if it does.

Mr. SHERMAN. Congress will be in session.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, my objection to this bill is that it appropriates $1,000,000 too little. The Secretary of the Navy in the letter which has been read at the desk, after stating that the $4,000,000 provided for in this bill are necessary in order to complete the fitting out of the vessels which are now in hand, says that if the Navy is to be strengthened $1,000,000 more ought to be appropriated for this purpose. He has reference to the double-turreted monitors carrying four 15-inch guns each, now dismantled and useless. Now, sir, we have nothing effective for war, except some large unwieldy wooden ships, but these three monitors, which can go to sea without being propelled by power extra to themselves; without having vessels go along with them to watch these floating coffins, to see that they do not suddenly plunge to the bottom of the ocean, and that the crews may be taken off and their lives saved and they taken ingloriously ashore. The ordinary monitor is excellent for harbor defense, but it is not fit to go to sea. Now, we have three powerful vessels, probably as powerful as any in the world. I doubt if the Monarch or any iron-clad in the English navy could stand against the Miantonomah or the Monadnock or the Puritan, provided they are put in fit condition. These vessels are able to go to sea. One of them made a cruise to the Mediterranean and up the Baltic, I think. Another of them went around the Horn, through the most inhospitable sea there is on this round globe—went there safely, with nothing but a little tender, she propelling herself, the tender simply carrying some supplies that were necessary on account of the length of the voyage, and not going for the safety of the vessel.

These powerful vessels ought to be put in order to provide for an emergency. Senators cannot say in the light of the last two or three months that, considering our peace principles or our geographical location in the world, such emergencies are not liable to come. When they do come, where we are unprepared, where vessels like these—the real power of the Navy—are in such a condition that they cannot be made fit for sea under six months, we are necessarily crippled, and are exposed to insult and aggression until we can get them ready.

Why, sir, the Pacific coast is now almost entirely unprotected. The monitor to which I have referred as having gone around the Horn is now at Mare Island. Its interior work is of wood, put there during the war or at the time the war was closing, and is all rotted, so that the vessel is entirely useless and would not stand the shock of its own guns; but by replacing that wood by iron beams, not adding to the weight of the vessel in fact, but, I am told, decreasing the actual weight, it can be made so good and strong that it will last twenty-five or perhaps fifty years without further need of repair, except it may be occasionally a little paint.

If this is done we shall have something to defend the Queen City of the Pacific, where now we have nothing. Now in the case of a foreign war, with a nation maintaining a navy in those seas, we are entirely defenseless. They can readily concentrate their navies in the Bay of San Francisco, passing by the few batteries we have on each side, unstopped by any iron-clad or anything adequate for the defense of the harbor, and levy their twenty, or fifty, or a hundred millions in gold on that city, and inflict disgrace on the American name.

I understand that the extra million which was asked for by the Secretary of the Navy was to put that monitor in order so that there might be some defense for that coast, and to put these others in proper condition so that there might be some opportunity for the country in case an emergency of this kind should arise again. I fully believe that it was by the prompt action of the Secretary of the Navy, as much as by the diplomacy of the Administration in the recent emergency, that we were saved a war. It is idle to say that the aggression which was committed on that occasion was unworthy of our notice. If it was worthy of our notice, it was worthy of it promptly and efficiently. Certainly, a ship bearing our flag was snatched from the seas. Certainly those who were sailing under the shadow of that flag were executed in the vicinity of Santiago de Cuba, and it was an aggression worthy of the attention of the American nation. If you say that, considering the character of those with whom we had to deal, there was no necessity for prompt action, that we might have left our inadequate Navy scattered where it was all through the whole extent of the North Atlantic stations and in the Mediterranean, let me recall that our consul at Santiago was prohibited from even seeing those men before they were shot; that the telegrams which he was sending to endeavor to ascertain the nationality of the vessel were intercepted; that it was necessary in the streets of Havana itself to station a guard of government troops around the house of our consul there to prevent his being outraged, and American citizens hid themselves in the shade for fear of being mobbed or massacred in the streets of that city; and certainly that was an emergency which required the active intervention of this Government, and showed the character of the people with whom we were dealing, and whom only fear would restrain.

Why, sir, more than that, although I believe in Castelar, though I believe him to be a noble man and a republican from principle, and heartily in sympathy with the institutions of the United States, a patriot in every sense of the word toward his own people, I still believe that he himself could not have stood up against the populace of Spain, and against the antagonizing forces he encountered, unless there had been this attempt on the part of the Government of the United States to put itself in readiness for war and show that it was prepared to strike provided its rights and its dignity were not respected. I believe that when our squadron was ordered home from the Mediterranean and concentrated in the Cuban waters, and when every available vessel was being put in order, those who held the Spanish bonds in Europe brought a pressure to bear on the administration of Castelar and upon the Spanish nation, inducing them to assent to the propositions which were made by the Government of the United States, and thus to tide over this mischief; and that this pressure was brought because our preparations showed us to be in earnest.

Sir, although it seems to be supposed by some that this exigency has passed, I do not believe it. I think the Castelar government is liable to be tumbled down any day. I am sorry to say that that is my judgment, and I believe that those who have noticed the course of Spanish affairs during the past few months must concur with me in that opinion. Suppose that that restraining influence upon Spanish action and upon Spanish aggression shall be taken away, what will be the result? Have there not been irritations enough in the past few weeks for pretenses for war, for more aggression upon American rights, for the confiscation of estates, for injuries to American citizens who may be in Havana or elsewhere in Cuba? Take off this restraining influence, and I believe that within a few weeks we shall find that we may be brought again to the point of war, and I would not be so unprepared as we were when the late emergency arose. I would have the Secretary of the Navy go on and finish these works in which he is now engaged, expend this $4,000,000 and put the Navy on something like a decent footing; and I regret it was not the sense of the committee reporting this bill that another million should be added to increase the effectiveness of the Navy.

My friend from Maryland talks about the force which it was shown by the report of the Secretary of the Navy we had on the North Atlantic station last year. The Secretary of the Navy when he is talking, not to us confidentially, but to attentive ears in other parts of the world, must couch in certain language the information which he gives. He must not show in fact the poverty of our resources. But as stated, even in this view, the whole number of vessels there was only eleven. On the 11th of November last, when the news came to this country of the seizure of the Virginius, and the conduct of the authorities toward its crew, we had nine vessels in all on that station, which embraced the entire eastern coast of North America and that of South America, as far as Cape Orange, near the mouth of the Amazon, extending eastward to the forty-third degree of longitude from Greenwich and northward to the Frozen Ocean. In all that vast area we had nine vessels, the Worcester, the Canandaigua, the Wyoming, the Juniata, the Nipsic, the Shawmut, the Kansas, the monitor Saugus, and the hospital-ship Pawnee, which was at Key West. One of these vessels was off trying to find the Polaris. Another was in the harbor of Aspinwall, with a hundred of its crew sick. Another had been ordered to Bermuda for the same reason. One of them was dismantled at New York. So we might go through the whole list. We were utterly unprepared for war.

The Senator from Maryland says we are expending millions on our Navy. Yes, sir; we are expending millions for the pay of seamen, and for the pay of officers for the shell of a Navy, while with a foolishness which, it seems to me, must strike the mind of every Senator we refuse to put that which is most important to a navy—vessels—under the feet of our sailors in such order that they may make good account of themselves in case of war. We have admirals almost without stint, we have officers, from Admiral down to master, in superabundance, I would say too many entirely, were it not for the fact that those whom we have retained, as a rule, have distinguished themselves and earned the gratitude of the country in a war that has recently passed. But when a proposition comes forward to increase the number of seamen, not of officers, fifteen hundred, to increase by 16 per cent. the number of sailors in the Navy, and to add to its cost but 5 per cent., that is opposed on what seems to me to be false economy. I object to that, but will not now discuss it.

But, sir, I was going to say that while we had but the nine vessels I have named in the immense area of the globe which I have described, Spain had at the same time in the same waters 66 vessels—66 against 9, and she had 387 guns in the same waters. And what was the character of the vessels? Were they Wyomings or Nipsics? Were they little wooden boats with one or two guns at the outside? Here was the Arapiles, with 17 guns and 800 horse-power, and then the Almansa, with 48 guns and 600 horse-power, and so I might run through a long list of Spanish steam-frigates, of which the smallest carried 26 guns and had a 360 horse-power. I have in my hand a list of these vessels which Spain could concentrate at one week's notice upon any given point in the waters of Cuba and sweep from the ocean anything which we possessed, unless we could send out the Puritan or the Miantonomah, or some vessel of that kind, if it was ready for the emergency.

I think it wise that this bill should be passed, in order that we may put our Navy into some sort of condition. If peace comes we are at no disadvantage for that. But if war comes on account of our still, as I must think, complicated relations with Spain, or comes with any other power, we may have some opportunity to defend our rights and maintain the dignity of the American people before the world.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, from such information as I have I cannot concur in the statement that our Navy is so unequal to that of Spain; and if I had so considered it I do not know that it would have seemed to me wise to state it. It may be true that we have no iron-clad that can stand before the iron-clads of the Spanish navy; but we have eight monitors, and Spain has none. Any one of these monitors can, with its crushing 15-inch shot, sink any of the iron-clads, and Spain knew that these monitors had congregated in considerable numbers at Key West. When this Cuban difficulty commenced we had but one monitor afloat; and the chief part of the expenditure that has been incurred has been to put seven more of these monitors afloat.

Mr. President, I express the sentiment of the American people in saying that they are grateful to the Administration for the statesman-like manner in which the most delicate and difficult duty of adjusting our differences with Spain has been performed. Our people were excited against the barbarous slavery of Cuba. They were outraged by the inhumanity of the treatment of the prisoners taken from the Virginius, and they felt that the flag and honor of the nation had been violated; and the excited feelings of the people were fanned and inflamed by public meetings, and many were influenced by motives much less worthy than those I have suggested. The tendency of the general outcry was to urge the Administration on to war. The Government, on the other hand, remembered that the controversy was with a young republic of fifteen million people, struggling for existence among the monarchies of the Old World; and remembered, too, that we were solemnly pledged to the great principles of peace and of arbitration; and the complication has been so managed that the national honor and the peace of the country have both been preserved. Sir, the American people, without distinction of party, are truly grateful to the Administration.

Mr. President, this expenditure of $4,000,000 has not been entirely lost. It has had its office in bringing about this happy result. I am in favor of the peaceful solution of difficulties, in favor of national arbitrations; and yet we all know that a little physical force in the background is an aid and support to moral influences. While it is true that Great Britain cannot be intimidated I am not quite certain that the fact of our having a million of men trained to arms and just from the field, and that a considerable Navy—not then out of repair—was in our possession, did not promote and accelerate the happy arbitration which has rejoiced this country and the world; and I am by no means certain that the calling of our squadron from the Mediterranean, and the congregating of the monitors at Key West, did not tend to bring Spain, without her being intimidated, the more carefully to consider the reasonableness of the propositions which the Administration laid before her.

The whole affair has been well managed and adjusted, and the expenditure by no means lost or wasted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator from Ohio will withdraw that motion for a moment I think the Senator from Maine will accept my proposition, and we can then pass the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I must express my surprise that the Senator from Ohio should move to adjourn in the present state of the country. [Laughter.] Certainly he does not propose to adjourn until as late an hour as twelve o'clock to-morrow. We ought to meet at eleven, I think. After the picture the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] drew of the dangers impending over us and the precipice at our feet, I feel most unwilling to adjourn now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will withdraw the motion to adjourn if a vote can be taken.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I call for the question on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read the third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. BOGY. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 46, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Ames, Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Crozier, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Gordon, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Ramsey, Ransom, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stockton, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—46.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Cooper, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Kelly, McCreery, and Stevenson—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Conover, Davis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Jones, Patterson, Pratt, Robertson, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thurman, and Tipton—19.

So the bill was passed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in further compliance with the resolution of the Senate of March 26, 1873, additional information in relation to the construction of the pneumatic tube between the Capitol and the Government Printing Office; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. DAVIS. A few days ago I offered a resolution calling for certain information in regard to the compensation of Senators. I ask that it be taken up now and passed. There is no objection to it, I believe.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator will allow this resolution to be taken up and passed. It is simply calling for certain information from the Secretary of the Senate. I do not think there can be any objection to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. DAVIS on the 12th instant:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate all information in his office relating to the fixing of the salaries of Senators and Representatives in Congress from the formation of the Government; in what cases provisions for salaries were made retroactive; how long a time in each case was covered by retroactive provisions; the names of Senators who drew their pay under such provisions; the amounts drawn by them respectively, with the dates of payment; the names of Senators who covered into the Treasury amounts due them under such retroactive provisions, and the date of such action; and also a comparative statement of the total compensation and allowance of Senators under the acts of July 28, 1866, and of March 3, 1873, respectively.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 17, 1873.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF VOTES, ETC.

Mr. ROBBINS. I rise to make a correction of the Journal. By a misunderstanding I am recorded as voting in the affirmative on the repeal of the bankrupt act. I desire to go on the record as voting in the negative.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman recorded as he voted, or did he vote differently from what he intended?

Mr. ROBBINS. My intention was not to be recorded as I am. I desire to be recorded in the negative.

The SPEAKER. That is not the point. It is very often the case that gentlemen, under a misapprehension, vote differently from what they intend; but in such a case the correction does not constitute a correction of the Journal, because the Journal shows a true record of the actual vote.

Mr. ROBBINS. I voted under a misapprehension.

The SPEAKER. That is not a correction of the Journal. The Journal cannot be changed in that respect; but the gentleman's statement now made will appear in the RECORD, and will show how he desired to be recorded.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to record my vote in the negative, as I intended.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think he is allowed to entertain the request. If such a proceeding were allowed the gentleman can see how it might operate in a case where a motion had been carried by a very small majority—perhaps a majority of one vote.

Mr. ROBBINS. I desire, then, to explain that I am not recorded as I desired.

The SPEAKER. It is proper for the gentleman to make that statement.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I rise to correct the record of a vote taken yesterday. Upon the motion to adjourn made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] I am recorded as not voting. I voted "no."

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman examined the Journal to see whether he is correctly recorded there?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I speak from an examination of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. A correction of the RECORD is not a privileged matter. The rules do not allow the House to be detained with the correction of mere typographical errors.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I presume the Journal agrees with the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. That may or may not be. The gentleman should satisfy himself on that point before rising to make the correction.

Mr. STEPHENS. May I be permitted to state how I should have voted if I had been in my seat yesterday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. STEPHENS. I should have voted in favor of the repeal of the bankrupt act, and against the proposition as adopted in relation to salaries.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I wish to occupy a moment or two with a personal explanation. When the bill in relation to bankruptcy was under consideration yesterday I made some remarks in the course of which I referred to the introduction of the bill by the lawyers of Jay Cooke & Co. What I said seems to have been misunderstood by some persons. Hence, I desire to say this morning that I did not say, nor mean to be understood as saying, that any member of this House, as an attorney of Jay Cooke & Co., was introducing bills here in the interest of that firm. What I meant was that lawyers of that firm, not members of the House, had brought a bill here and procured its introduction. I intended no reflection upon any gentleman whatever.

COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Rules be directed to report an amendment to Rule 74, by adding thereto a committee on internal appropriations, to consist of eleven members, whose duty it shall be to take into consideration all executive communications and such other propositions in regard to carrying on the Treasury Department, Interior Department, and Post-Office Department of the Government as may be presented and referred to them by the House, under the same limitations and subject to the same conditions as now apply to the Committee on Appropriations.

Objection was made.

CONDUCT OF THE DISTRICT JUDGE OF ALABAMA.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom has been referred the resolution requiring said committee to inquire into the conduct of the judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Alabama, shall have power to send for persons and papers.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE DURELL.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, also submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to inquire and report to the House whether Judge E. H. Durell, judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of Louisiana, shall be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors; and that said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers.

REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to submit a report made by Mr. Durant in relation to the revision of the statutes. I have caused a copy of the report to be laid on the desk of every member. It will be found very useful in the examination of the revision. I move that this report be referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States.

The motion was agreed to PAY OF CONSULAR OFFICERS.

Mr. SENER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of revising and readjusting the compensation of the consular officers of the United States.

CUBAN BELLIGERENCY.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask unanimous consent to present a letter and memorial from certain citizens of New York, for reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I ask that these documents, which are very short, be read.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, December 16, 1873.

DEAR SIR: As chairman of the executive committee appointed by the citizens of New York and vicinity, I have the honor to report that at a mass meeting held at Cooper Institute on the evening of the 12th of December, A. D. 1873, the inclosed memorial and resolutions were unanimously adopted; and in compliance with the following resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That the people in mass meeting here assembled do hereby request ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS and S. S. COX to present the memorial to the Congress of the United States."

Resolution offered by Hon. Horace Brainard, and adopted by a standing vote, which was entirely unanimous.

I herewith transmit to you said memorial and resolutions, and ask your earnest attention to the same.

Very respectfully,

EDWARD H. KENT.

Hon. S. S. COX, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned memorialists, residents of the city of New York and vicinity, respectfully show:

That for more than five years there has existed a state of revolution in the Island of Cuba, caused, as your memorialists believe, by the efforts of the native-born population to throw off their allegiance to Spain.

We further respectfully represent that, while acknowledging the right of the Spanish government and people to retain their possessions in Cuba, we claim that they are bound by the laws of humanity and civilization to conduct their measures of repression in accordance with the laws recognized by all civilized nations.

From information received, we believe that the greatest possible atrocities are frequently practiced; men, women, and children are indiscriminately murdered by the representatives of the Spanish government, even after resistance has ceased.

During the past few years nearly three thousand political prisoners have been shot or otherwise executed, many of them without any form of trial; nearly five thousand prisoners have been taken, whose fate—probably worse than death—is unknown save to their captors. Worse still, over three hundred women and children have been driven to the woods without food or shelter, the inhabitants forbidden to communicate with or assist them under penalty of death; nay, more, they have been hunted, torn, and mutilated by blood-hounds, and sacrificed to the lust of a cruel and unrestrained soldiery, acting in the name of the government.

We respectfully represent that we feel these acts to be a stigma and a disgrace to our common humanity, and that it is our duty to use all lawful means in our power to put a stop to these horrors.

We therefore pray your honorable bodies to speedily adopt such measures as will in future prevent the recurrence of these cruel and inhuman acts.

And it is further resolved, That the citizens of New York and vicinity, in mass meeting here assembled, most earnestly pray that the Senate and House of Representatives will immediately grant belligerent rights to the people in the present contest in Cuba for independence, against oppression, and the holding in bondage by Spain of a people of different color and race.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of various war claims referred to it, and that the same be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. KELLOGG, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to this House a statement of the amount of duties collected and paid on all the goods, wares, and merchandise specified and provided for in the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, to reduce the duties on imports, &c., which were collected under said act during the year from August 1, 1872, to August 1, 1873; and also the amount of duties which would have been levied under the law prior to the said act of June 6, 1872, or on all goods, wares, and merchandise aforesaid, if said act had not been passed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. DUELL, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings be authorized to investigate, and report in writing to the House—

1. The condition and management by the Government officials of the moneys heretofore appropriated for the erection of public buildings.

2. Whether such moneys have been distributed in conformity with the appropriation laws.

3. What retrenchment can be made in the expenditure of moneys appropriated as above without detriment to the public service; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to take testimony to enable it to make such investigation and report.

SHIP-CANALS.

Mr. WHEELER, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the following cases, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals:

A bill (H. R. No. 167) to provide for the construction of a ship-canal around the Falls of Niagara;

A bill (H. R. No. 85) providing for the improvement of the Dismal Swamp Canal, in Virginia and North Carolina;

A bill (H. R. No. 46) to provide for the construction of a steamboat-canal and slack-water navigation to connect the Ohio River and the sea-board, by the way of the Monongahela and Youghiogheny Rivers, the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, and the Potomac River, for the purpose of affording a cheap and commodious transit for the agricultural and mineral products of the West, and thereby promoting commerce, stimulating industry, and rendering accessible a vast region covered with marketable timber and inlaid with rich deposits of coal and iron; and

The memorial of Joseph B. Macy and 263 other citizens of Nantucket, Massachusetts, praying for an appropriation to make a canal from the east end of the harbor of said Nantucket from what is known as the "Haul-Over."

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire into the cost of reporting and printing the debates of Congress as the work is now being done; whether it was not more acceptably and economically done by the proprietors of the Globe; whether the permanent establishment of the work at the Government Printing Office will not involve large expenditures for facilities for its prosecution, and to report by bill or otherwise at as early a day as practicable.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AND CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask unanimous consent to offer, for reference to the Committee on Railways and Canals, resolutions requesting that committee to inquire into the expediency of maturing a bill for a better system of national defense and cheap transportation. I ask that the resolutions be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can have the resolutions referred by title and printed. In asking unanimous consent, gentlemen should not call for the reading of long papers.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Very well; let the resolutions be referred.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. This cannot come back by a motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. It cannot, under the rule.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I call for the regular order.

LOAN OF 1858.

Mr. DAWES. Before the regular order is entered upon, I ask leave to report back from the Committee on Ways and Means the bill (H. R. No. 478) to provide for the redemption of the loan of 1858, with amendments by the Senate. I am instructed by the committee to move concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire separate votes on the amendments?

Mr. DAWES. No, sir; I desire concurrence in them all.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I cannot withdraw the call for the regular order, if this matter is to take up time. If it can be disposed of in a short time, I shall not antagonize the gentleman.

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt that it will be disposed of in a few minutes. The Committee on Ways and Means instructed me yesterday to ask a committee of conference. That, however, might prevent this bill from becoming a law before the holidays; and on further consultation the committee have come to the conclusion, as the amendments are of very little importance and affecting phraseology more than substance, to instruct me to ask concurrence.

The Clerk read the amendments of the Senate, as follows:

Strike out, in lines 10 and 11 of section 1, the words "of 1858 as well as the registered bonds of said issue;" so as to read, "it is hereby declared to be the pleasure of the United States to pay all the coupon bonds of said loan on the 1st day of January, 1874."

In the same section, lines 14 and 15, strike out the words "carry into effect the provisions of this act is appropriated therefor," and insert "redeem said coupon bonds is hereby appropriated for that purpose;" so as to read, "and coin in the Treasury sufficient to redeem said coupon bonds is hereby appropriated for that purpose."

In section 2, lines 6 and 7, strike out the words "such of said," and insert in lieu thereof "any of the;" so as to read, "for any of the bonds of the loan of 1858," &c.

In section 2, line 8, strike out the word "as" before the words "the holders," and insert the word "which" in line 10 after the word "the;" and before "funded" insert "said;" and at the end of the section add: "And no interest shall be allowed on the new bonds for any time for which interest is paid on the bonds exchanged."

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read as it will stand with the Senate amendments.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, was read, as follows:

An act to provide for the redemption of the loan of 1858.

Be it enacted, &c., That for the purpose of redeeming the bonds issued under the act entitled "An act to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $20,000,000," approved June 14, 1858, as amended March 3, 1859, called the loan of 1858, it is hereby declared to be the pleasure of the United States to pay all the coupon bonds of said loan on the 1st day of January, 1874, at which date the interest thereon shall cease, and coin in the Treasury sufficient to redeem said coupon bonds is hereby appropriated for that purpose.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury may issue an equal amount, at par of principal and interest, of 5 per cent. bonds of the funded loan under the act for refunding the national debt, approved July 14, 1870, and the act amendatory thereof, approved January 20, 1871, for any of the bonds of the loan of 1858 which the holders thereof may, on or before February 1, 1874, elect to exchange for the 5 per cent. bonds of the said funded loan, with interest from said January 1: Provided, That no commissions or allowances whatever shall be paid for the exchange of bonds hereby authorized, and no interest shall be allowed on the new bonds for any time for which interest is paid on the bonds exchanged.

Mr. DAWES. I will state in two minutes, if the House will listen to me, the difference between the bill as it went to the Senate and the bill as it comes back, so far as I understand it. As the bill went to the Senate, the House declared it to be the pleasure of the United States to pay in coin, on the 1st of January, the coupon bonds and the registered bonds; the bill as it comes back from the Senate declares it to be the pleasure of the United States to pay the coupon bonds on the 1st of January. The reason the Senate has stricken out the words "and the registered bonds" is because in the registered bonds the phrase "at the pleasure of the United States" does not occur; it occurs only in the coupon bonds. The Senate has also put in a phrase declaring a little more explicitly that there shall be under any circumstances interest only upon one set of bonds. Beyond that, if I understand the amendments correctly, there is no change. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the Senate amendments were concurred in.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTILLERY WAREHOUSES.

Mr. BECK. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means unanimously to report back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 614) to so amend the laws relative to internal revenue as to allow distillery warehouses to be continued in use after changes have occurred in the management of the business.

The bill was read. It provides that when, from death or from any other cause, there shall be a change in the person, firm, or company engaged in the business of distilling at any distillery, and the person, firm, or company that by reason of such change ceases to carry on said business at said distillery has, at the time of such change, spirits in the distillery warehouse, it shall be lawful for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, upon the written consent of the surviving members and sureties interested, and under such rules and regulations, and upon such other conditions as he may prescribe, to permit the succeeding person, firm, or company to use the distillery warehouse on the premises in the same manner as if it did not contain distilled spirits belonging to the original person, firm, or company, after setting apart and separating by a secure and unbroken partition such portion of it as may be necessary for the storing and safe-keeping of the spirits distilled by the original person, firm, or company, during the period allowed by law for the removal of distilled spirits from distillery warehouses, or until said spirits are moved and the taxes paid thereon within that time; provided that nothing therein contained shall impair or in any way affect the lien existing at the time of such change under section 1 of the internal-revenue act of July 20, 1868, as amended, or other liabilities under any internal-revenue law, but the existence of such lien shall be no ground for refusing to approve the bonds of the succeeding person, firm, or company, anything in section 8 of said act of July 20, 1868, as amended, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. BECK. I can explain in one word the reason for the passage of this bill. Under the law, as it now stands, there can be but one distillery warehouse on distillery premises, and persons who manufacture distilled spirits have a right to allow it to remain in that bonded warehouse for one year. If one partner in a firm of distillers dies, and the distilled spirits remain in the warehouse, as they have a right to do, for one year, and they are frequently sold in bond with the right to the purchaser to retain them there for one year, the Commissioner has no authority to allow the business to go on, and it has to stop, and whatever cattle or grain may be on hand has to go to waste. The injustice of this was so apparent to the Department that they framed regulations permitting this thing to be done under the existing law, but upon examination it was ascertained that it was not legal. Therefore, when a large number of cases had accrued, whereby an immense amount of revenue was being lost, the Department sent me a few lines saying that this bill ought to pass. I think beyond all question it ought to pass, and I send up the letter of the Commissioner to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, December 15, 1873.

SIR: Inclosed I return to you the draught of a bill submitted by you for my examination. I am of the opinion that some such bill should be passed. I inclose the draught of one which embraces such changes in yours as seem to me judicious.

Very respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS,
Commissioner.

Hon. JAMES B. BECK, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BECK. I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BECK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to report back from the Committee on the Judiciary the civil-rights bill.

The SPEAKER. That is of no higher privilege than the bill which is before the House as the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But we waived the regular order for a whisky bill, and we ought certainly to waive it for civil rights.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I insist on the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call my brother's attention to the fact that after yielding for a whisky case, he now calls the regular order against civil rights.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I called for the regular order because I thought that was the best way of disposing of the business before the House.

AMENDMENT OF A RULE.

Mr. MAYNARD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved, That Rule 145 be amended by inserting the following after the word "present," in the fifth line thereof: "nor without the motion therefor being seconded by a majority, as in the case of the previous question."

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. EDEN. I rise to a question of privilege. I find myself recorded on the Journal as voting in the affirmative on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] yesterday to adjourn. I voted in the negative on that motion, and I wish to have the Journal corrected accordingly.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I rise to a question of privilege. Upon an examination of the Journal I find that I am recorded as not voting upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] yesterday to adjourn. I voted in the negative on that motion, and I wish to have the Journal corrected.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected. The Chair must say that the fault of these errors lies with the members themselves in creating so much noise that the tally clerk cannot hear the responses of members. Generally, the commencement of the roll-call is taken as a signal for disorder.

POST-OFFICE DEFICIENCIES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, with estimates, vouchers, and explanations of deficiencies in his Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPEAL OF THE SALARY BILL.

The House then resumed, as the regular order of business, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 793) to repeal the increase of certain salaries, and to establish the rate of the same.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to reconsider the vote whereby his amendment to the bill was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, and upon that motion the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HAYS] called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RICE. Allow me one word in my own defense. Last night when the vote was taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa I was not present in my seat, as I suppose I ought to have been. I came in while the vote was being taken, and supposing it to be on a motion to adjourn, I voted in the negative. If I had known what I was talking about, I should have voted "ay." [Laughter.]

Upon ordering the yeas and nays, the Speaker ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. KASSON and Mr. HAYS as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 46, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was upon laying upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment moved by Mr. KASSON was adopted.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Is that motion divisible?

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in ten years' experience in the House, has never known that to be done.

Mr. DAWES. If the House shall refuse to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, then the question will be on the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. Of course. The Chair will explain the motion. In effect the House votes only upon one motion. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] enters a motion to reconsider, and follows it with a motion to lay his own motion to reconsider on the table, which is the parliamentary process of clinching a vote. Those gentlemen who desire a reconsideration will vote against the motion to lay on the table; and if that motion shall be negatived, the question will then come up on the motion to reconsider.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 168, nays 94, not voting 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. SLOSS said: I wish to state that my colleague, Mr. SHEATS, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. My colleague, Mr. BLAND, has been called home by an engagement paramount to his obligation to be here.

Mr. SCOFIELD. My colleague, Mr. NEGLEY, is unavoidably absent.

Mr. EDEN. My colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, of Illinois, has been called home on account of sickness.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move to amend the first section of this bill by striking out the words at the close of the section "during his present term of office," after the words "and to the President of the United States." The effect of that amendment, if adopted, will be to take entirely out of the action of this bill the salary of the President, and not limit the present salary to his present term. In other words, it will leave the salary of the President for the future the same as for the present term. I wish to say preliminarily that my own disposition and preference in regard to this bill is to make it a bill, pure and simple, regulating the salaries of members of Congress, without interfering with any other officials whatever; in other words, to put it upon the basis of the original bill reported from the committee, which met my hearty approval.

I have made the motion in this form limiting it solely to the question of the President's salary, for the purpose of seeking to take the sense of the House upon the question of the President's salary. As to the salaries of heads of Departments and the subordinate departmental officers, and the officers and employés of the two Houses of Congress, I trust they will first and last be made the subject of distinct and separate votes in the House.

I wish now to say a few words only upon the general subject of the presidential salary, whether the amount fixed by the act of the 3d of March, 1873, is an extravagant and inordinate amount or not. To determine this we have the right to look not only to the question of the value of the time, four years, which the occupant of the presidential chair spends in the execution of his office, but we are to look also to the effect upon the man himself in regard to his whole future life, to its effect upon the standing and dignity, in its proper and true sense, not the false dignity of such an officer, and to everything that relates to the position, character, and standing in the community, socially as well as in public life, of one who has been the President of the United States.

Now, the President, when he goes out of office, is substantially debarred from the ordinary pursuits and avocations of life, professional, commercial, public, or otherwise. That is the ordinary rule. With a single exception that has been the rule with regard to all our Presidents. I do not believe that a President, at the expiration of his term of office, should be left impoverished by his position, as was the case with Thomas Jefferson, who was absolutely eaten out by the social duties which his position as Ex-President imposed upon him, so that he should finally go to his grave utterly bankrupt. That was the case with Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. If the gentleman——

Mr. HALE, of New York. I cannot yield.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I simply want to know——

Mr. HALE, of New York. I decline to yield. One word more. By the law of 1789 the salary of the President of the United States was fixed at $25,000 a year, and stood at that sum without change until March 3, 1873. I have prepared a little statement from the statutes to show how the First Congress of the United States appreciated the presidential office in comparison with other offices—executive, legislative, and judicial—at that day. The same Congress that fixed the salary of the President at $25,000 a year fixed the salary of the Vice-President at $5,000 a year, or one-fifth of that of the President. It fixed that of the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury each at $3,500—about one-seventh that of the President. It fixed the salary of the Secretary of War at $3,000—about one-eighth that of the President. It fixed the salary of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court at $4,000—not quite one-sixth; and the salary of the associate justices of the Supreme Court at $3,500—about one-seventh. It fixed the compensation of members of Congress at six dollars a day, besides mileage at thirty cents per mile. I leave out of my computation mileage, because at that time, when our present facilities of travel did not exist, thirty cents a mile was very little, if at all, in excess of the actual expense of travel. Under that statute, and for the first three Congresses, the average compensation of members of each House of Congress was less than $1,000 a year.

Now, it is plain that Congress, in fixing these salaries, had in view not merely compensation of the President for the time of his actual service. They did not believe, any more than this House believes, that the time of the President during his official term is worth twenty-five times as much as the time of a member of this House. They recognized the fact that the President, by virtue of his position, has a burden imposed upon him for his whole life, making it proper and just and equitable that he should be left at the close of his term with something amounting to a competency.

In this connection I desire to allude to what was said by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] the other day in regard to the additional allowances of the President. The salary allowed to the President by the very first act passed on this subject was in addition to the use of a house and the furniture of that house.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, in the shred of time allotted me under the order of the House on this question, I cannot make an argument. If I succeed in briefly stating my own views with reference to this bill, and what I desire to do upon it, I shall have accomplished all that is possible under the circumstances.

Let me say, before proceeding further, that I deeply regret (and I say it with all kindness) the tone and temper in which this question has been discussed here. The debate has been conducted too largely in a spirit of crimination and recrimination. The tone of attempted explanation and exculpation which has characterized many of the speeches delivered will not, I fear, add to the confidence with which the people will regard our deliberations or the satisfaction with which they will regard the result at which we may arrive.

Sir, if I had my own way in this matter I would repeal the whole increase of salaries made by the act of March last so far as we constitutionally may; and then, in the light of the discussion we have had here, with the benefit of the discussion in the press and among the people on this subject, I would, with deliberation, in open day, raise a committee which should dispose of this whole question so far as it affects all officers, from the President of the United States downward. If this course had been adopted, no matter what might have been the conclusions arrived at, whether the salaries finally agreed upon were those fixed by the pending bill or those provided by the act of March 3, 1873, our decision, adopted by such a process and under such circumstances, would have been willingly accepted by the people of the United States.

But, sir, the House having declined to take this course, I wish to indicate wherein I dissent from the provisions of the pending bill, wherein I approve of them, and how I would desire to alter them. In the first place I would make the deduction applicable to the present Executive. I would repeal his increased salary as well as that of others. I would repeal it because it is excessive as compared with that of every other official, as it was asserted and shown by the honorable and able chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, that he receives in addition to it more than $50,000 a year by way of appropriations to his personal establishment. If the constitutionality of its repeal be questioned, it is not to be doubted that in more than one instance the President has affixed his signature to bills of more doubtful constitutionality than this; but if the question should be raised, let it be settled by the courts, where it properly belongs. The President being the only person affected, and his signature being the highest evidence of his belief in its constitutionality, surely his mouth would be closed forever, and it is not likely, therefore, that the question would ever be raised. Sir, if there were sincerity and earnest purpose in his late recommendation to Congress to adopt a constitutional amendment giving the President power to veto portions of an appropriation bill while approving others—if this recommendation was not intended merely to evade responsibility for the past and to cast an implied imputation upon the action of the Forty-second Congress on this subject, it will doubtless be his highest satisfaction to have this opportunity to vindicate his action and motives. I would propose to give it to him. I trust his friends and supporters will not deny it to him.

I am in favor of the provision of the bill maintaining the salaries of the judges as now fixed. I am in favor of this because we require—at least we have heretofore required—in these officers that "skilled mental power" so eloquently described by the honorable and learned gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.] Heretofore we have demanded of them high character, great legal learning, unspotted moral worth. They may not engage in any of the ordinary pursuits of life. They may not better their fortunes by "accepting gifts," thereby imitating the example of him who by the common consent of the age in which he lived, and of all succeeding time, was

The brightest, wisest, meanest of mankind.

With reference to the pay of members of the Cabinet, with reference to the pay of employés of this House, I may have my doubts as to what the respective amounts should be; and that question could have been best settled by the process I suggested in the opening of my remarks—that is, by the deliberate consideration and report of a committee.

One word more, and I shall have finished. I have heard much on this floor in regard to "popular clamor." I have heard it denounced. I have heard it scouted at. I have heard gentlemen say they would defy it. I wish to say that for long years the people of this land have been astounded by frauds and corruptions in private life and in official position—in municipal, State and national affairs. Everywhere corruption and fraud have stalked abroad defiant and unpunished. Sir, the occurrences here during the last session of the Forty-second Congress, referred to in general terms by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] and more particularly by the honorable gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] who addressed the House yesterday, did not do anything to calm this feeling in the mind of the public, but rather excited it still further. And this increase of salary was "the last straw which broke the camel's back."

Public clamor! What is it? It is the first evidence of that coming storm of public wrath which is rising all around and about us. He who conceives that he can withstand or defy its fury will find himself overwhelmed and undone. Yesterday, sir, it raged over the grand old Commonwealth which I have the honor in part to represent. It swept from her river which flows to the sea to that which empties into the Gulf; from her lake on the north to her southern borders. It has rendered forever hereafter impossible fraud in her elections, and has exorcised the corruption in her legislation which has heretofore cursed and degraded her.

This is what this public opinion has done for my State, and what when needed it will do for others; and when we bow to it, when we submit to it fairly and honestly, as we may and should, the people will rejoice, sustain, and approve.

I have exhausted my time and will trespass upon the attention of the House no longer.

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Speaker, I send up an amendment to the amendment, which I ask be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Vice-President of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Attorney-General, the Postmaster-General, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Speaker, I concur entirely in the sentiments expressed by my colleague from New York, [Mr. HALE,] that the President's salary stands upon an entirely different ground from the salary of members of this House. It was fixed at a time when $25,000 in gold was more than $100,000 to-day in producing the necessaries, the elegancies, and the comforts of life.

I am at a loss, however, to understand by what process the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] calls upon this House to vote for a law which is unconstitutional, as we believe, under the expectation that the President would sign such a law and then leave it for the courts to determine as to its validity.

The object of my amendment is to leave the Cabinet officers and the second and third officers of this Government where they were left in the act which it is proposed to repeal. It is apparent from the temper of the House that the design is to establish a permanent rule regulating salaries for all future time, and we therefore ought to make it as just and as right as possible.

But, sir, I wish to say at the outset that the Speaker of this House does not desire, and I have the highest authority for saying it, that his salary should be increased. But we are establishing a rule not for him alone but for all coming Speakers. And in regard to the Cabinet officers and the other officers who are proposed to be left as they now stand under the act of March 3, 1873, I have heard no complaint anywhere that their salaries are too large. But in regard to the Cabinet officers, as I have already indicated, they have stood heretofore upon the same plane with the judges of the Supreme Court. We have placed their salaries at $10,000, which is for present and future judges, in all of which I concur. By common consent, then, the salary of Cabinet officers should be on the same foundation. They are unlike others; they can engage in no business; they spend their whole time at the capital; they have their families here; while we, with the exception of ten months out of twenty-four, are at liberty to engage in any other pursuits or avocations.

And as to the second and third officers of this Government it seems to me, in view of their dignity, it is eminently proper they and the judges and the members of the Cabinet should be put precisely upon the same level.

Therefore I hope, sir, as we are establishing a rule, we will not place the President of the United States in the humiliating position of saying to him, as we shall without these amendments, "We think you are receiving more than you are morally entitled to. You are receiving twice what your predecessors received and twice what any of your successors will receive."

I have no sympathy with any attempt to do indirectly in regard to the expenses of the President's department what we cannot do directly, by cutting them down and compelling the President to pay them out of his own purse. I think we ought to have a proper regard for the exalted dignity of that official without reference to the present incumbent, because we are legislating for the future. His salary should be $50,000; for when the salary was first established it was twenty-five times the amount then paid to members of Congress, who only received $6 a day, amounting to $1,000 a year, whereas now, with a salary of $50,000, he receives only, according to the reduced rate fixed by this bill, ten times the salary of a member of Congress. I hope, therefore, both amendments will be adopted.

Mr. LOWE. Mr. Speaker, I rise pro forma to oppose the amendment. In the five minutes to which I am limited I cannot enter upon a general discussion of this bill, and I shall not seek to contribute anything to the sensationalism of this debate; but, as one who participated in the legislation of the last Congress, I desire to express in the briefest manner my own position in respect to the subject under discussion. When the proposition to increase salaries was presented to the last Congress I was unable to give it my approval, not so much from any conviction that the increase proposed was disproportionate to the reasonable needs of Members and Senators in the efficient and honorable execution of the duties of their official life, as because I deemed it unwise and injudicious in the then existing state of the country, its finances, and its obligations, to enlarge expenditures in that direction, and I was of opinion that it was better for Congressmen, Senators, heads of Departments, and supreme judges to await the advent of more prosperous times before insisting upon more complete and adequate compensation. I therefore opposed and voted against the measure in all its preliminary stages; but after it had been attached to the general legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill by a majority vote of the House, and been approved by the conference committee of the House and Senate, I favored the adoption of the report, covering as it did other legislation of vital importance, the questions upon which could not be divided and the failure of which would jeopardize the entire bill. The circumstances and considerations which led me to the views I then entertained, adverse to the measure, still exist with increased force; and as the question is now again presented unembarrassed by complications with other legislation, I shall favor and vote for the reinstatement of the former rule of compensation, or any measure that approximates it.

Sir, although upon the hustings, and in much of the sensational journalism of the country, this subject has been largely discussed as involving a question of moral integrity, I insist that it is not actually such any more than is any other subject of legislation within the proper scope of congressional action. In view of the undoubted constitutional power of every Congress to fix the compensation of its own members, in view of the fact that that power has repeatedly been exercised by Congress, with the approval of the country, in the same mode as was done by the Forty-second Congress, and by the most honored names in our history, he must be a bold man, or a man ignorant or reckless of the facts of history, who would for that cause impute a want of personal or official integrity. Whether the legislation of 1873 upon this subject was wise and judicious or not, if those who participated in its enactment are to be impaled in obloquy by reason of its retroactive features, then it is an obloquy that must be shared by the members of the Thirty-fourth and of the Thirty-ninth Congresses, and they, embracing such names as Solomon Foote, John P. Hale, Charles Sumner, Henry Wilson, William H. Seward, John J. Crittenden, Benjamin F. Wade, Stephen A. Douglas, Hannibal Hamlin, Lyman Trumbull, William Pitt Fessenden, E. B. Washburne, Robert C. Schenck, and Thaddeus Stevens, must likewise be placed in attainder of perpetual reproach; for of these, and all the other members of Congress in 1856 and 1866, some voted for, and all (with one exception) received the benefits of, the retroactive salary bills of those years. Such names as these cannot be divided from the glory of our history, and no principle can be just the application of which would consign them to reproach. If in principle there was any difference between the act of 1866 and that of 1873, it would certainly have been sharply developed in the course of this debate; but even the industry and acumen of the eloquent gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] have been unable to discover any distinction, and when pressed upon the point he is compelled to concede that the only difference between the two is that one was more generally approved than the other.

Frequent reference is made to the alleged public will of the country upon this subject. It is true, sir, that it has been the subject of wide discussion, and while no one doubts the fact that the adverse criticism has largely proceeded from honest conviction and patriotic effort and purpose in the direction of a just administration of government, it is not necessary to disguise from ourselves the fact that no inconsiderable portion of illiberal criticism has been the offspring of personal and political hates and rivalries and personal and political ambitions. Still, after making due allowance for that which is only the unconsidered vituperation of speech and pen, and which entitles itself to no consideration, I think in fairness it must be conceded that the settled judgment of the country insists upon a reinstatement substantially of the old law. To the considered and well-ascertained judgment of the country, upon any proposed subject of lawful legislation, I should be disposed to defer, even if my own views were otherwise. But in addition to the considerations originally involved in this subject, the question comes upon us now, when the condition of the country demands our earnest efforts in the direction of retrenchment and a husbanding of the resources of the country, and whatever may be our own views of the value of congressional services, we cannot do better than to begin economy and retrenchment with ourselves.

Mr. DAWES rose.

The SPEAKER. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] to withdraw his amendment to the amendment, and I will renew it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will not withdraw the amendment. Let us have a direct vote on the proposition. It stands in the way of other amendments to the bill, and I object to its being withdrawn.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to be heard a very few moments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my objection for the present to allow the gentleman from Massachusetts to be heard.

Mr. DAWES. I renew the amendment pro forma, for the purpose of saying a few words. I am opposed to the amendment and the amendment to the amendment. I am opposed to it for the reasons I submitted the other day, re-enforced by the condition of the Executive Departments of this Government, and desiring to stand in defense of those officers against this legislation.

Sir, I feel at liberty to say that nothing could be so unfortunate as for us in this condition of affairs to insist upon putting these officers in the position of clutching at increased salaries with one hand and gathering in new taxes with the other—coming to Congress and imploring Congress to meet the current expenses by the imposing of new burdens upon the people, and in the next voice standing up here and claiming that they of all others shall hold on to this increased salary. No such unfortunate position as that shall be assumed by my aid. I take the liberty to say in behalf of all those men that they are in heart and in spirit with us in the desire to cut down every unnecessary and extravagant expenditure, whether it be in salaries or anything else; and the day will come——

Mr. TREMAIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. TREMAIN. Has the gentleman the authority of any member of the Cabinet to say that he is opposed to these being the salaries for the future?

Mr. DAWES. I have the authority in the character of all those men to say that they will not stand up before this country and insist that we shall proceed to increase the burdens of the people in order to meet this increase of their own salaries while we cut down our own and all others. That is my authority. If my friend finds nothing in the character of the men who hold these high positions that justifies him in standing by my side in vindicating them against the position into which they are thus forced, he misrakes them. Sir, the people of this country have confidence in these men. The people of this country believe that they are in those places, not for the sake of the filthy lucre that is attached incidentally to their position, but they are there to serve their country—to take its sacrifices as well as to take its honors. And that is why I have striven for the floor—solely in vindication of their honor here in this House against the position into which they are forced by this attempt.

I will not go before the people of this country and say that these men desire to have their salaries held up to this extravagant increase which the people have condemned, and that at the same time they come here and desire us to tax the people anew to find the means for paying them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts permit me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WOOD. I merely desired to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the President has drawn his back pay.

Mr. DAWES. Why, sir, I know nothing about such things. [Laughter.]

Mr. STORM. I rise to oppose the amendment pro forma.

I supported the act of March 3, 1873, and am willing to take my stand by that action. But if the system of reduction is to go on, and if the salaries of members of Congress are to be struck at in this way, then I am willing to go through the whole scale and reduce all the salaries that were increased by that act, including the President's salary, and the salaries of the Vice-President, the Speaker of the House, and the members of the Cabinet. If reduction is to be made I am willing to go back to the old law as it stood prior to March 3, 1873.

But I wish particularly to call the attention of the House to this fact. Much abuse has been heaped upon the action of the Forty-second Congress. I stand here to vindicate the action of that Congress with reference to the salary bill which took the form of law on the 3d of March, 1873. I believed that action just; I believed it to be right and fair; and I believe it to-day. And I see nothing in the condition of things, nothing in the circumstances of the times, to change my opinion, save the public clamor which has been raised against the action of that Congress.

Three great abuses came down from former Congresses which that Congress undertook to meet and remedy. These were the franking privilege, the mileage system, and the stationery abuses. I say that those three abuses had defied the action of many preceding Congresses; and the Forty-second took up those questions and disposed of them in a way that met the popular demand. In a communication made to this House by the Postmaster-General, on the 12th of January, 1871, he stated that the single abuse of the franking privilege alone amounted to the sum of $2,523,000, making a sum, if divided among the different members, equal to over $7,500; and yet which of all the newspapers that have been heaping abuse upon the action of the Forty-second Congress has ever stated that the Forty-second Congress, by repealing that franking privilege alone, made a saving to the people larger than the whole increase, larger than all the compensation received by members of Congress at the present time?

Not one of them has ever given to Congress credit for repealing an abuse which had been arraigned by public men of the past and of the then existing time. Horace Greeley had spent most of his life in arraigning and condemning the franking privilege; and I tell the gentlemen to-day who have voted to reduce salaries that they are only preparing the way for the restoration of that enormous abuse. This bill will hardly go out of the House before I expect to see some gentleman rise here and propose to restore that abuse. If gentlemen are willing to take the responsibility of that restoration they may do so, but I never will. Then there was the mileage system, which cost for each member in each Congress $900. They propose to restore that. I am not in favor of it. I believe that the act of March 3, 1873, should rather have been called an equalization of salaries than an increase of the same, because that is what it was.

I think, sir, that three things have been established in this debate, either by admissions or by countervailing arguments which have been presented. The first is that the act of March 3, 1873, was sanctioned by the Constitution. That is not denied, and the provision of the Constitution which sanctioned it did not get in there by chance; it was discussed in the Convention, it was discussed by the people of the States before they ratified it, and the Constitution supports and sanctions the action of the Forty-second Congress on this question. Another thing demonstrated is that that measure had for its support a line of unbroken precedents from the origin of the Government down to this time; that every Congress that had heretofore passed on the question had done precisely what the Forty-second Congress did; and yet which of the newspapers or which of the demagogues who have been abusing that Congress has ever given us credit, or given the public information of what was the action of prior Congresses on this subject? They have been silent on that subject which would cover with disgrace the memory of our best Presidents, of the purest statesmen that have ever lived.

Another thing that has been established here by the argument is that $7,500 is not an increase of our pay; that it is less compensation than $5,000 with the franking privilege, with the stationery allowance, and with the mileage abuse added to it. It is only a fair, honest, honorable salary which can be understood by the people. But when you put it back to $5,000, and restore the franking privilege and the mileage and stationery abuses, you will increase the salary beyond and above what it was fixed on the 3d of March last. I have said thus much because I have been abused, and my colleagues who acted with me have been abused, for our action on this question. My colleagues have been hissed into silence in the convention of our State, and we have had no fair hearing; and I am glad that this debate has furnished an opportunity for vindicating the action of the last Congress.

I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am willing to bow to what is called public opinion on this question. And I do it without complaining, and would have done it in silence had not the public press forgotten its high functions of giving correct information on this important subject. It has suppressed the truth for the purpose of putting in a false position men who have ever maintained good characters for honesty and purity in all their public acts. They have been ruthlessly assailed as "thieves" and "grabbers" for doing that by which, if it had been fairly presented, none of this clamor would have been raised. The facts on both sides have now gone to the country, and I am willing to abide by the second sober thought of all good and honest people.

I have voted to repeal the act of March 3, 1873; but I shall oppose at all times any attempt to restore the abuses which that act repealed.

Mr. TREMAIN. I propose to modify my amendment at the express request of the Speaker of the House, who desires that his name shall not be included in it. I therefore propose to strike out the words "the Speaker of this House."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to modify his amendment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] moves to strike out the words "during his present term of office," so as to leave the salary of the President of the United States untouched. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] moves to add to that the Vice-President of the United States and the members of the Cabinet, so as to leave their salaries at $10,000. The first question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COX. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 75, nays 191, not voting 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Archer, Averill, Bradley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cessna, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Crooke, Darrall, DeWitt, Eames, Eldredge, Farwell, Field, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, Hays, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hooper, Houghton, Hubbell, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Lamport, Lansing, Lewis, Lofland, Lowndes, Maynard, MacDougall, McJunkin, Morey, Myers, O'Neill, Page, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Phelps, James H. Platt, jr., Poland, Potter, Randall, Richmond, Ross, Sawyer, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sloss, Smart, Stanard, Stephens, Stowell, Thornburgh, Townsend, Tremain, Waddell, Wallace, Marcus L. Ward, White, and John M. S. Williams—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Beck, Bell, Berry, Biery, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Davis, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Durham, Eden, Elliott, Fort, Foster, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, Herndon, Hersey, Holman, Hoskins, Howe, Hunter, Hunton, Hyde, Hynes, Jewett, Kasson, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lawrence, Lawson, Leach, Loughridge, Lowe, Luttrell, Lynch, Magee, Marshall, Martin, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McKee, McLean, McNulta, Mellish, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Monroe, Moore, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, Nunn, O'Brien, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Perry, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rawls, Ray, Read, Rice, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Rusk, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, Scofield, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Standeford, Starkweather, Stone, Storm, Strait, Strawbridge, Swann, Taylor, Thomas, Todd, Tyner, Vance, Waldron, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—191.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Begole, Bland, Crittenden, Hurlbut, Lamison, Mitchell, Negley, Niles, Purman, Rapier, James C. Robinson, Sheats, William A. Smith, St. John, Sypher, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wood, and Woodford—19.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, when his name was called, said: Under the instructions of my State I vote "ay." [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that, as the House is proceeding as in Committee of the Whole, the motion to reconsider need not be made.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2 of this bill by adding what I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And all moneys paid to Senators, Representatives, or Delegates of the Forty-third Congress under the provisions of said act of March 3, 1873, as increase of salary for the Forty-second Congress, shall be charged and reckoned as part payment of their compensation as members of the Forty-third Congress; and that within ten days after the passage of this act the Treasurer of the United States shall forward by mail to each member of the Forty-second Congress (who is not a member of the Forty-third Congress) who received additional compensation under said act of March 3, 1873, a written or printed notice, informing him of the repeal of so much of the said act as gave such increased pay, and also stating the sum thus paid to such member, and requesting such member to repay the same to the Treasury; and within ninety days thereafter said Treasurer shall report to each House of Congress the names of all such members, the sum paid to each, the names of those who have repaid, and all replies received to such notices.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is not germane to the pending amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order at this time. The pending question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] to strike out of section 1 the words "during his present term of office," in relation to the salary of the President.

Mr. HOLMAN. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 55 in the affirmative—one-fifth.

The call of the roll was commenced, and after a response had been made,

Mr. WHITE said: Is it in order for me to read a clause of the Constitution in relation to this subject? If so, I desire to call the attention of members.

The SPEAKER. After the roll-call has been begun and a response given by a member debate is not in order.

The roll-call was then completed; and there were—yeas 71, nays 185, not voting 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Archer, Averill, Barber, Biery, Bradley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cessna, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Cook, Crooke, Curtis, DeWitt, Eames, Farwell, Freeman, Garfield, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hancock, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, John W. Hazleton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Herr Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Stanard, Standeford, Starkweather, Stone, Storm, Strait, Strawbridge, Swann, Taylor, Thomas, Todd, Tyner, Vance, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—185.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, when his name was called, said: Under instructions I vote "ay." [Laughter.]

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 478) to provide for the redemption of the loan of 1858.

SALARY BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the salary bill.

Mr. POLAND. I now offer the amendment I indicated some time since.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] contains two separate and distinct propositions. If it is not divisible I ask the gentleman to allow me to move a substitute for his amendment.

Mr. POLAND. I have no objection to its being divided, if it can be done, and a separate vote taken on each portion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the amendment which I have drawn up is a little more practicable than that of my friend.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask my friend from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] whether he thinks there is any power in this House to take from the members of the last Congress who are not members of this Congress the money they have drawn under the bill of the last session?

Mr. POLAND. My amendment does not propose to do that.

Mr. BECK. You do not propose to take it from them. They have a constitutional right to hold it. Then why, if they have a constitutional right to hold it, as well as the President of the United States has to hold his, does the gentleman undertake to insult them behind their backs and dare not put the same proposition to the President?

Mr. POLAND. If the gentleman will wait until I have explained my amendment he will understand what I mean by it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that my proposed amendment be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That the amount which shall have been received by any Senator, Representative, or Delegate of the present Congress who was a Senator, Representative, or Delegate of the Forty-second Congress, as increased compensation known as "back pay" for the Forty-second Congress, by virtue of the said act approved March 3, 1873, shall be deducted in equal monthly installments from the salary of such Senator, Representative, or Delegate hereafter accruing during the present Congress under the provisions of this act.

The SPEAKER. The amendment just read cannot be entertained at the present time.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I wish to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] propose to speak to this amendment, or does he yield to the gentleman from Indiana to have his amendment read?

Mr. POLAND. I have no objection to allowing the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana to be read.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I wish to offer my proposition as an amendment to that of the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. POLAND. I cannot accept it as such.

The SPEAKER. The amendment sent up by the gentleman from Indiana will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That if any member of this House has received fees from the United States since the 4th of March last, pursuant to an act entitled "An act to authorize the continued employment of an agent and counsel of the United States," approved March 3, 1873, the amount thereof shall be deducted from his salary as a member of the Forty-third Congress; and if such fees have not yet been paid the payment thereof, either directly or indirectly, is hereby prohibited.

Mr. SPEER. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to state whom that amendment would hit?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. That would not be a part of the amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPEER. The House ought to know.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, this House has already decided by a hundred majority that the increased compensation allowed to members of Congress by the act of last March shall be repealed, and that every member of this Congress shall account upon his salary for this Congress for the compensation he has received at this larger rate since the 4th of March last. This is said to be in obedience to the popular judgment. My amendment proposes to provide that each member of this Congress who was a member of the last Congress, and who received an increase to his compensation in that Congress, shall also account for the same upon his salary for the present Congress.

I offer this proposition in obedience to that same popular judgment. Every man on this floor understands that the popular outcry against the increase of salaries was mainly directed against that portion that was called "back pay;" and if we design in good faith to carry out the popular judgment, we must, so far as it is in our power, compel every man who received that "back pay" to account for it upon his present salary, or in some other way.

So far as the "back pay" is concerned, I do not claim that by repealing the law we can authorize a suit to be brought and recovery had in any court to get that money back into the Treasury. But I do claim that we have perfect authority to provide for a deduction of the amount of that "back pay" from the salary of present members of this House; and what we have already decided by a hundred majority is a perfect precedent for such action.

Nobody would pretend—at least I would not, and I do not think any other man would—that by repealing the law we could authorize an action to be brought against any member of this House who has been drawing this increased salary monthly since the 4th of March last. It is only by applying the increase upon the salary for the future that we can reach the result; and there is no greater legal difficulty in compelling members of this House to account for the increased salary received during the last Congress, than in requiring them to account for the increased pay drawn for the term beginning last March.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a single question, directly in the line of his argument?

Mr. POLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the gentlemen believe that we have a right to pass an act affecting the pay of members in such a way as to leave the salary of some members at one rate, while that of other members of the same Congress is fixed at another rate?

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am proposing that the salaries shall all be fixed at the same rate. Under my proposition every member is to receive exactly the same amount of money. It is entirely immaterial whether we can or cannot lay the foundation of an action to recover the money by repealing the law. We propose to say to certain men, "You have so much money in your hands which in equity and good conscience you ought to account for."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does not the gentleman propose to make a deduction from the pay of some members, and not from the pay of others?

Mr. POLAND. With but five minutes allowed me, I cannot stop to have a colloquy with the gentleman. I will only say that I propose to make the salaries equal. And at any rate, as I argued the other day, I believe that under the Constitution we have a perfect right to make the salaries unequal if we choose.

But I want to say a word to every man who received the back pay, and I am myself in that category. If Congress should provide by law that the salary shall be put back at the old figures, $5,000 a year, is there any man here who can stand up and say that he can or dare retain this accidental $5,000 which dropped into his pocket between the two Congresses? I say that the true course for every man in this position is to vote for my amendment, and to account upon his salary for the increase he has drawn. There is not a man who can keep that money in his pocket if the proposition which has already been adopted in this House by a hundred majority should become a law.

I want to say a word also to the men who have at this session come into Congress for the first time. This House has already, by a hundred majority, said that for this increase of salary which you have thus far received under the law you shall account upon your salary, although we have no authority to authorize its recovery at law. We have the same right to say that every man who, for the last Congress, and under the same law, received an increase of $5,000 shall account for it in the same way.

A word as to the other part of my amendment, which relates to those men who have gone out of Congress. I admit we cannot legally reach them. We cannot authorize an action to be brought against them; we cannot bring them into court and make them account for the increase of pay which they have received. But when we repeal the law under which they received that increase, when we have compelled every man within our reach to restore the increase of pay which he has received, if we provide that the Treasurer of the United States shall give these men official notice that the law has been repealed, with a request for them to make restitution, that money will burn in their pockets, (if it is still there,) so that they cannot keep it there.

I tell you, Mr. Speaker, this is not a mere brutum fulmen. It is a pretty efficient legal remedy against those men. If any of them look to any political future they will heed such a request of the Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. BECK. I ask the gentleman from Vermont whether he thinks the President's money will burn in his pocket?

Mr. POLAND. That question, Mr. Speaker, is hardly germane to the present amendment.

Mr. STORM. Let me ask the gentleman where has he kept his money during all that time?

Mr. POLAND. I have already said that I was not one of those who returned back pay. If this Congress had said $7,500 was the proper salary to be maintained for members of Congress I should have felt under no conscientious obligation to have returned it; but when this House has, by one hundred majority, said that the raising of salary was wrong, and we must go back to the old figures, I do not think I should have had the hardihood myself to keep that $5,000; and I do not believe there is a member who would do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Vermont whether he has been burned by the back pay which he has taken, and whether he now complains because of that burning upon his conscience and in his pocket. [Laughter.]

Mr. POLAND. There has been a considerable change of circumstances within a day or two. [Great laughter.]

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I have listened during this whole discussion with a great deal of interest. Being a new member, I come here perfectly untrammeled, to speak and to vote according to the best light which may be thrown upon it by the debates which have already taken place; and it is my wish and intention to act consistently with my duty as a member upon this floor. I must say, then, notwithstanding all which has been said so far by the advocates and defenders of the act of March 3, 1873, that in my judgment they have entirely failed to vindicate themselves. And although I dislike, as a new member in this House, to say anything which would seem to reflect severely upon my predecessors, still in justice to my own convictions of duty and my own opinion of what are the wishes and the interests of the people I represent, I must declare that the law increasing salaries was injudicious, unwise, impolitic, and uncalled for.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] whose constituent I am, according to his declaration made the other day, and who represents four million people, and thirty-two members upon this floor, in advocating the amendment this afternoon does not, in my opinion, correctly represent the people of his State. Does he remember the action of his own State convention last fall? Did they not set the seal of their condemnation upon it? Although the gentleman was elected a year ago last fall, he ran some seventeen thousand votes behind his ticket; and when the Administration party went before the people in our State last fall, every man upon our State ticket, supported by the united vote of democrats and liberals, was triumphantly elected. Therefore I say I represent my constituents in denouncing the act of March 3, 1873; and I believe, sir, that I truly represent the people of my own State in this regard, without reference to party or party affiliations.

It is time, Mr. Speaker, that economy should be practiced in Government expenditures; and where can it commence better than in this House? While the great industrial interests of the country are almost paralyzed; while the laborers of the country are almost all out of employment; while mechanics' tools lie idle in their shops; when the busy hum of machinery no longer greets the ear—when such is the condition of affairs why should we not have economy here? And I tell you, sir, that economy should commence in this House by repealing the whole salary bill as far as it may be constitutionally done. I only regret we cannot reach the salary of the Executive himself.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] during the debate the other day mentioned incidentally that the whole expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June, 1872, was $26,700,000, and he appeared to think that was a mere bagatelle. The fact is, a great many gentlemen have been members for so many years, and have so lavishly voted away the hard earnings of the toiling millions of the people, that they consider $26,000,000 but a very small amount. With $300,000,000 to carry on the Government and to pay the interest upon the public debt it is time the people should be looking at this question, and they are looking earnestly to see what our action will be. We should practice economy; and when we do put ourselves right upon the record, then, and not till then, can we go before the people asking for further taxation to meet the increased expenditures of the Government. The people showed themselves loyal and true during the trying days through which we passed in maintaining the national honor and the national credit, and they will not fail in this emergency. We have seen what they will do because the present administration, having failed to do its duty in this regard, the people spoke out loudly against them in the last elections.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Just one minute more. This bill is not all I desire——

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object to any extension of time.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. This bill is not all I desire; but it is the opening wedge. It will rest on a foundation as solid as granite itself, for it rests upon the intelligence and integrity of the American people, who, at their own time and in their own way, will apply their power at the purchase, and will lift from its foundation the fabric of extravagance and corruption which has come to us as one of the inheritances of our civil war.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That the amount which shall have been received by any Senator, Representative, or Delegate of the present Congress who was a Senator, Representative, or Delegate in the Forty-second Congress, as increased compensation for the Forty-second Congress, by virtue of the said act approved March 3, 1873, and has not been returned to the Treasury, shall be deducted, in equal monthly installments, from the salary of such Senator, Representative, or Delegate hereafter accruing during the present Congress, under the provisions of this act.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I ask my colleague to allow me to offer my amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] accepts my substitute.

Mr. POLAND. There seems to be some question in the minds of some gentlemen as to the last part of my amendment; I am willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I hope that my colleague will now allow me to offer my amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it the same that my colleague offered before?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. My colleague must know that the gentleman from New York, to whom his amendment refers, was authorized to receive his compensation by act of Congress.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I did not name the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my colleague will not insist upon that amendment. If he does, of course I should be compelled as a matter of courtesy to yield to him. But my colleague must see another thing. His amendment is not in order. The purpose manifestly in view——

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, and Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is entitled to the floor, and is the only gentleman entitled to it. The rules recognize but one gentleman on the floor at one time. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will proceed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have not hitherto taken part in this debate, but I desire to say a few words in support of the proposition I have submitted—a proposition necessary for the complete repeal, as to members of Congress, of the salary law. If there be any one thing the House clearly understands it is that the whole country, forming an opinion upon well-considered facts, has condemned the action of Congress in the passage of the measure generally known as the salary act of the 3d of March, 1873; and that the country demands that Congress shall repeal that increase of salary, shall retrace its steps, and restore things to their former condition as completely as it can be done under the Constitution. Every utterance of the people demands this—the public press, public conventions of all parties, and, as far as it could be done, the ballot-box. It is not "public clamor," but the deliberate judgment of the people. I do not understand gentlemen when they call in question the right of the people to direct their own affairs. I understand this to be a Government of the people for the people. It is their own Government; and I hold it to be the duty of the Representative, when he ascertains the deliberate and well-considered opinion of his constituents on a question of public policy clearly defined—not the result of the passion of the hour, but of deliberation—to acquiesce in it, and act upon it in his representative capacity; and if he is not able to do so in conformity with his own sense of what is right and proper, he should restore the trust to those who delegated it to him. Without this obligation of the Representative to his constituents, a government of the people would become practically impossible.

The people demand the repeal of this salary law. Can any reasonable man deny that this is the deliberate public judgment? They demand, as far as it can be done, repeal and restoration. It is not only the "back pay," but the permanent increase of salaries that is condemned. For myself, I concur in this public judgment. I opposed by speech and vote this salary act, and did not receive the retroactive salary. My own conviction is, and always has been, that the former pay of a member of Congress was a very ample compensation. All the salaries paid by this Government were ample, and generally more than ample. There was no justification of any increase; indeed, the argument was in favor of reduction. The legislation of the years since the war justified public alarm. Unless the people were prepared to assert their rights, and resist the ever-growing profligacy of expenditure, their Government was doomed to be overwhelmed by the remorseless flood of corruption. If the people themselves had not shut down the flood-gates of improvident and corrupting appropriations from their Treasury, there is no depth of public dishonor and demoralization which would not have been reached in the early future. The popular voice of alarm was not raised a moment too soon. This salary measure awoke the nation from a deadly repose. Did the country suppose it possible that, with the remorseless growth of expenditure, there could still be purity in public affairs?

Sir, if there are to be purity, integrity, honesty, and honor in the administration of our affairs in the future, there must be not only economy but parsimony in your expenditures. Such is the lesson which the purer and better days of this Government teach to the present hour, and such is the lesson of all history. Corruption and venality—the outgrowth of vast expenditure—may give strength to monarchy, but they are death to a republic; for integrity in public affairs is the solid rock on which a republic rests. Your expenditures will either be frugal or profligate; there is no half-way ground. If frugal, honor and integrity will control your affairs; if profligate, the nation will groan under taxes that a few may grow excessively rich.

Do you imagine that while Senators and Members of this House are drawing large salaries, greatly beyond the compensation in corresponding private employments, it is possible to have economy in government? And do gentlemen imagine that it is possible to have purity in government without economy in government? Economy and purity in the administration of affairs are convertible terms. The argument of the present hour is unanswerable. With vastly increased expenditure year after year, the standard of public honor year after year declined. The country demands that Congress retrace its steps.

This bill, as now amended, accomplishes that object substantially, except as to the retroactive salary; but one step further is required, so far as gentlemen still in Congress are concerned, and that is embodied in the amendment which I have submitted, now under consideration. The amendment is as follows:

And provided further. That the amount which shall have been received by any Senator, Representative, or Delegate of the present Congress who was a Senator, Representative, or Delegate in the Forty-second Congress, as increased compensation for the Forty-second Congress, by virtue of said act approved March 3, 1873, and has not been returned to the Treasury, shall be deducted, in equal monthly installments, from the salary of such Senator, Representative, or Delegate hereafter accruing during the present Congress, under the provisions of this act.

With this amendment the bill will stand with the salary at $5,500, all perquisites cut off, and the back pay and increased pay of all members of this Congress covered into the Treasury or provided for. I do not think that any gentleman can object to this proposition, for certainly no gentleman can doubt that the public judgment demands it. Nothing else will fully satisfy the people. This would be a virtual restoration of the former law as to members of Congress.

Speaking for my own constituents and for that great body of citizens with whom I have ever acted—the democratic party—I unhesitatingly assert that on this subject there is, on their part, but one voice, that this salary law must be repealed and restoration made, so that the compensation of members of the last Congress who are members of this Congress shall be upon the basis of the old law. And they further declare that the integrity and purity of this Government demand an actual reduction of these and all other official salaries which have been from time to time increased under the financial inflations of the late war. Their judgment is, that in consequence of the redundant currency of the war, official salaries, in common with all other forms of expenditure, have grown vastly beyond a just compensation, and that a proper regard for the public interest demands a reduction commensurate with the reduced cost of living and the general shrinkage of values.

The Committee on Ways and Means, in my judgment, will find no difficulty in saving that $42,000,000 deficiency in the revenues if they will go to work bravely and lay the ax at the root of the prevailing evil—examine expenditures, and reduce the expenses which have grown up under the excessive currency of the war to the actual wants and necessities of the country. With reasonable economy there is no necessity for increased taxation. It is economy and not increased taxation that is demanded.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, and Mr. BECK rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky, and after he is through will recognize the gentleman from Maine. Under the regulation of the debate proceeding as in Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] cannot demand the previous question until the amendment shall have been spoken against.

Mr. BECK. If the gentleman from Maine will give me five minutes of the hour allotted to him to close the debate, I will say nothing now.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will agree to do that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, then, recognizes the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PERRY,] the only other gentleman whom he knows of who desires to be heard.

Mr. PERRY. Mr. Speaker, it is well known that I do not often occupy the attention of the House with speeches, and that I claim no honors conferred on me in that line; but upon matters of such moment as are now under discussion I have views which I wish to put forth in the plainest manner and fewest words.

In the matter of salary increase and the franking privilege I have a desire to put myself on record. In my opinion the salary bill passed at the last session of the Forty-second Congress ought to be repealed and the pay fixed at $5,000 per annum, with the franking privilege restored so far as to cover all public documents which Congress orders printed for the information of the people, and all letters and papers to and from members which are strictly connected with official business.

As to the matter of newspaper postages, I have a word to say on that subject. It was found after the adjournment of the Forty-second Congress that in repealing the law relative to the "franking privilege" the clause which gave newspapers free circulation in their respective counties was also annulled, and although this was not intended by Congress, it has, nevertheless, operated very injuriously, and especially upon the country press.

In its practical effect it has compelled the publishers of the country press in many instances, more than can be specified, to pay postage on their papers, and has thus diminished in many cases what was at the most a slender income and a limited local circulation. Subscribers of long standing have been known to say to the publisher, "stop my paper, for I cannot pay postage." The publisher will lose the subscriber unless he reduces his rates, which he cannot do, or pays the postage directly or indirectly, neither of which can he afford to do.

There is also the injustice of favoring the city press at the expense of the country press, village papers, for instance, and I will mention Schoharie County, a part of my district. Papers cannot be delivered from the village post-office, to which they are sent directly from the printing office, without paying as much postage as is paid on a paper from the city of Washington, which must be conveyed nearly four hundred miles in Government mail-bags. The law discriminates injuriously against the country press, which every member knows ought to be sustained. Country papers are as important to their localities as city papers are to cities, and they deserve all the more encouragement because, as their sphere is limited, their influence is more direct.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, to be eminently proper and right to restore to all the press throughout their respective localities the privilege of free circulation, and not deprive them of any advantages they have heretofore enjoyed in extending knowledge and information broadcast throughout our land.

If I am not mistaken, it costs the Government really no more for transmission than would have to be paid for carrying the mails if they were not transmitted at all, as it does not enhance the amount paid for mail contracts. It is thus merely a revenue tax upon the press from which they ought immediately to be relieved.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I now do what I believe nine members out of ten desire me to do, and call the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will not call the previous question until I can have an opportunity to test the sense of the House on an amendment in relation to the pay of our employés.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine demands the previous question on the bill.

Mr. LEACH. I have been trying for a week to get the floor to offer an amendment to restore the franking privilege, because I believe the people of the country demand it. I hope the gentleman will allow a vote to be taken upon that; otherwise I hope the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has demanded the previous question on the bill, and on that question the Chair appoints Mr. HALE, of Maine, and Mr. LEACH tellers.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the previous question be sustained, will it cut off all further amendments and debate?

The SPEAKER. It will bring the House to a direct vote on the pending amendments and on the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then let us vote it down.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The debate has been running hour after hour and day after day, and I believe the House wants to settle the question. This will leave all the amendments pending.

Mr. TYNER. Is the demand for the previous question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. TYNER. Then I object to debate.

The House divided on the motion of Mr. HALE, of Maine; and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 143.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is an amendment in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is not; debate is exhausted on the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] and on the amendment thereto offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] The previous question will be considered as operating on those amendments, debate being exhausted upon them. Does the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] accept the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] as a substitute for his own?

Mr. POLAND. I do.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read again.

The Clerk again read the amendment, as follows:

And provided further, That the amount which shall have been received by any Senator, Representative, or Delegate of the present Congress, who was a Senator, Representative, or Delegate in the Forty-second Congress, as increased compensation for the Forty-second Congress, by virtue of said act approved March 3, 1873, and has not been returned to the Treasury, shall be deducted, in equal monthly installments, from the salary of such Senator, Representative, or Delegate hereafter accruing during the present Congress, under the provisions of this act.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to offer an amendment as an addition to that amendment.

Mr. POLAND. That is not in order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why not?

The SPEAKER. The previous question is operating on the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. No; the previous question has just been voted down.

The SPEAKER. That was on the bill; the previous question is clearly operating on this amendment.

The question was put on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 61, noes 82.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. POLAND called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a question of order. The Constitution of the United States forms a part of the rules of this House, and I raise the point that under the Constitution of the United States the House cannot adopt this amendment as a part of the law.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not sit here as a judicial officer to expound the Constitution. If he ruled out all that is not constitutional it would probably greatly enlarge his functions. [Laughter.] He does not do it.

Mr. KASSON. I think they ought to be enlarged in relation to this question.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 155, nays 102, not voting 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Archer, Arthur, Banning, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bowen, Bradley, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Bland, Roderick R. Butler, Darrall, Harmer, Hersey, Lamison, Lewis, Lowe, Lowndes, Marshall, Maynard, McLean, Mills, Mitchell, Morey, Pendleton, Purman, James C. Robinson, Sheats, William A. Smith, Stephens, St. John, Swann, Sypher, Tyner, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodford—28.

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the calling of the roll,

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, said: On this question I am paired with Mr. PENDLETON, of Rhode Island. If present, he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, the House now acting as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair inadvertently permitted that motion to be made and voted upon this morning.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend the first section of this bill by striking out of line 8, as printed, the words "or employé." The effect of that amendment, if adopted, will be to relieve from the operation of this repealing bill the employés of the two Houses of Congress, our pages, our laborers, our doorkeepers, and that class of persons. Gentlemen who were here in the last Congress will recollect very well that the subject of their pay was considered carefully, independent of the question of the salaries of members of Congress, and it was found that many of those men were inadequately paid. The pages for the House of Representatives were receiving fifty cents a day less than pages of the Senate. These things, or a great many of them, were provided for and adjusted in the bill before provision in relation to salaries of members of Congress was incorporated in it.

I have been at the pains to obtain from the Clerk of the House a list showing the compensation of the employés of the House as it was prior to the passage of the law of last session, and as it is now. I call the attention of gentlemen to that statement, in order that they may see what we are now doing in reference to these inadequately paid officers and employés. Before the law passed at the last session there were 45 folders who were paid $3.60 per day; under the law as it now stands they are paid $4.14 per day, their pay having been increased 54 cents per day. Then there are 23 pages, who are paid now $3; and so with regard to various other employés. This question was considered at the last session entirely independent of any question in reference to our own salaries or the salaries of the President and members of the Cabinet. I respectfully submit to the House that these laborers are worthy of their hire, and I trust there will be no objection to allowing their compensation to stand where it was fixed by the last Congress after a very full, careful, and deliberate consideration. I do not desire to occupy unnecessarily the time of the House, and will submit my amendment to a vote, calling attention again to the following statement of the compensation of the employés of this House:

NOTE.—The number of folders and their pay is under the control of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. CROUNSE. I am not advised very particularly in regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] While I might at the proper time and under proper circumstances vote for it, I apprehend that at this time it will embarrass what I think is the principle which is controling this House.

I have sat here for some time listening attentively to this debate on the salary question, for the purpose of discovering, if possible, what principle is guiding this House in its action. It is conceded that the act of March last found its warrant in the Constitution, and that it had precedent after precedent to support it. It is conceded on all hands that so far as the action of this House is concerned it is fully warranted by law. Now, if I have been able to discover the motives which prompt the action of this House at this time it is a reflex of the principles and the sentiment which it is said emanate from the people, and which brands the act of the last Congress in regard to salaries as a fraud in toto. That is why I would have liked to support the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] for the purpose of testing the honesty of the House.

It is a very cheap business for gentlemen to make their proclamations of obedience to the will of the people and all that; but, sir, it costs something when gentlemen have to put their hands right down into their own pockets and pay $5,000 for such a proclamation. I say I am totally opposed to attempts to make this sort of cheap reputation for honesty and frugality; and I am glad to have an opportunity to proclaim my conviction on this question. I desire that my acts upon this floor shall be characterized by honesty of motive. I want not to be scared by any false clamor; nor will I co-operate with those who create such clamor and then run from it, hastening in a sort of scramble to see who can run fastest, and dive deepest, and stay down longest. [Laughter.] Such a course is belittling, it is degrading to the dignity of this House. If we do a right act, let us stand by it, clamor or no clamor. It is not, I say, the province of a statesman to cower before the clamor of his constituents. It is his duty to mold public sentiment. If we find, upon full examination, that it is necessary to increase our salaries to $10,000, let us do it; if we find it necessary to bring them down to $5,000, let us do it. But let us consider the question like gentlemen and like statesmen. Let us not stand here trembling in our shoes lest we may not return to these seats again. I let no consideration of that kind weigh with me. There is an old French saying, "What must a people be whose god is a monkey?" I say what must a people be who are to be satisfied by idle clamor and protestations of bowing to the popular will. I have but little confidence in a large part of these protestations. I make no reflection upon any member; but I appeal to all whether there has not been a sort of heartlessness and emptiness in much that has been said here.

If it should be the disposition of this House to repeal the act of last March so as to put all these salaries back in statu quo, I shall stand with other gentlemen in support of such a measure; and, when the proper time comes, I well consider fairly, squarely, and honestly this question of salaries; but at present let us repeal that act in toto, if that is a proper reflex of the sentiment of the people.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I offer the following amendment:

Amend the second section of the bill by adding thereto the following:

Provided, also, That the members of this Congress who were members of any preceding Congress, and who received retroactive increased compensation under an act passed at that Congress, shall have the amount deducted from the compensation which may become due them respectively in this Congress, unless such member has already returned such increase to the Treasury.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a point of order. I submit that this proposition is not germane as an amendment to my amendment, which relates solely to the employés of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will withdraw my amendment until a vote is taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MAYNARD, there were ayes 47, noes not counted.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now offer the amendment which was read a moment ago.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, is that amendment germane to the bill?

The SPEAKER. What point does the gentleman raise?

Mr. HOLMAN. I only submit that it is not germane to the bill. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will make any more definite point upon the amendment, the Chair will rule upon it. The amendment has reference to salary, and of course is germane.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me the proposition is inconsistent with the legislation embraced in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot see how there can be a right to go back and legislate concerning the pay of the Forty-second Congress, without there being an equal right to go back to the Thirty-ninth or any previous Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very likely the Chair is right.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is evidently within the power of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have not trespassed upon the time of the House heretofore in this debate, and I do not propose to do so now. If it is logical to require the refunding of back pay received for the Forty-second Congress, it is just as logical to require the refunding of back pay received for the Thirty-ninth and the Thirty-fourth Congresses. If back pay was wrong for the Forty-second Congress it was equally wrong for the Thirty-ninth and the Thirty-fourth Congresses. Therefore, I hope we shall adopt this amendment, and then I hope we shall bring ourselves to a vote upon a proposition that shall put an end to further discussion. I think the House, in instructing the committee in accordance with the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] meant that our salaries should be fixed at $6,000 a year, which should be in lieu of all allowances except actual traveling expenses; that it did not mean to interfere with the salaries of the employés of Congress or the salaries of other officers of the Government.

Mr. DAWES. What, then, was the meaning of that part of the instructions which referred to that subject?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That part was put in, I have no doubt, to sweeten the dose. [Laughter.]

Now, let us go back to the matter perfectly clearly and like men. After we have followed this to its legitimate logical results, and included the Thirty-ninth Congress, I trust the bill which will be introduced by my friend from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] fixing the salary at $3,000, to take effect from the passage of the act, will be passed, and we shall proceed to public business.

Several MEMBERS. Good.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Forty-second Congress I desire to present to this House and the country my reasons very briefly for the course I have taken in connection with the bill increasing the salaries of Senators, Representatives, and other Government officials. I am thankful that a fitting opportunity has presented itself for so doing, and that it has become not only a privilege but a duty for the members of that body to speak in vindication of their own rights and conduct. Since the adjournment of the last Congress, many attempts have been made by the press in my own State and elsewhere to provoke a controversy with me upon this question, but until now I have remained silent amid misrepresentation and abuse, preferring to be heard here upon this floor first, and address my constituents from this stand-point.

When the salary bill was before the last Congress I regarded the measure as calculated to arouse public indignation and bring upon the members of that body the severest criticism; and in this I was not mistaken. The people at that time were having their attention called to the most gigantic frauds ever committed in this or any other country, and were justly sensitive upon all matters which would tend to increase the burdens which they were then called upon to bear by a system of taxation unequal and unjust. Believing then that there was no occasion for the passage of such a bill, and that economy should characterize every act of Congress, I steadily voted against the measure from the beginning to the end. Time has proven conclusively that the legislation was unwise, inexpedient, and wrong.

There was, however, a propriety in some of the first steps taken in connection with this subject (as admitted by all) to modify the old law giving to members of Congress mileage, because under that law the pay of Senators and Representatives was unequal and unjust. This modification could and should have been made without becoming obnoxious to the people of the country who have excessive burdens of taxation, and without increasing our own pay. Justice alone demanded this, and when the question was first moved in the House, members labored more to equalize salaries than to increase them. But, unfortunately, the present law was the fruit of all their effort. Great injustice has been done many members in connection with this matter.

It seems to be assumed by a certain class of people that there was a combined effort on the part of all to defraud the Government, and by this rule men are to be judged. No matter how honestly they may have acted, or how pure may have been their motives, they are all alike guilty of corruption and stealing. The press has raised this cry in many instances, and a clamor, never before equaled, has been put forth without any regard for truth or propriety. Men who have hitherto been considered among the best and most incorruptible have been assailed and classed among thieves and the most depraved. In the name of justice and fair dealing I here enter my protest against this course, as it not only involves the individual character of the members of this body, but the good name of our country. The congressional election in my own district for the Forty-third Congress occurred five or six days after the adjournment of the last Congress, and it was stated shortly after that election, by the New York Tribune, that I stumped my district avowing my intention not to take the extra pay, and thereby secured a seat in this House, when, in fact, I remained here until the adjournment, and not a speech was made or a word uttered upon the stump in any manner whatever by myself or any one in my behalf; but, on the contrary, it was fully understood by my political friends and others that I intended to take the money and should take it. Since the meeting of the present Congress this same paper has reiterated this slander and falsehood.

Is not a little of the honor and honesty of Horace Greeley, the great founder of this paper, wanted here in this connection? Other publications, governed by the same unworthy motives, have copied these articles, and by such means false impressions were obtained, not only in regard to myself, but others throughout the length and breadth of the land. I only ask to have the truth fairly and honestly presented. I now stand ready to defend my action in connection with this matter, and have no regrets or apologies to offer to any one. If I am called upon to make presents with my own money I prefer to be my own judge to decide when, how, and to whom they shall be made, or whether made at all. Can it be assumed that, because gentlemen have taken opposite courses in this matter, as a necessary consequence some have acted honestly while others have acted dishonestly, and have been governed in their action by base and wicked motives? Cannot men honestly differ in regard to their rights and their duties? I took my money because the law of my country gave it to me, and because it was my right to do so.

Others may have a different, and what they regard a more virtuous, standard by which they are governed, than the law of their country, but I am willing to take this for my guide. In doing what I did I acted in accordance with my own judgment, and followed in the footsteps of great and good men who have gone before us, and whose examples we have been taught to believe will not lead men very far from the path of duty. Upon all of my public acts I invite the closest criticism by those whom I have the honor to represent and from the country at large, for no man has a more profound respect than I have for an honest and intelligent public sentiment. It is the surest and safest guide for us to follow in all we do and say.

Now, while I ignore and detest the madness which has characterized some men and a portion of the press upon this subject, I fully indorse that other and better sentiment which has been expressed by honest people throughout the land. They have pronounced their verdict against the present law, and in their interest, and in the interest of the country, I will most cheerfully vote to wipe out this legislation. In doing this let the principle apply to the highest as well as the lowest. Let there be no exceptions. Starting with the President, whose hand gave force and vitality to this measure, let the work go on until it reaches the humblest clerk. If the principle is sound, and I believe it is, it should be made to apply to all classes alike. If, under the Constitution, it will not reach all now, the time will soon come when it will. If we mean genuine, thorough reform, it can be done in no other way. Having said this much I am content.

The SPEAKER. The vote now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I demand the previous question on my amendment.

Mr. BECK. Is an amendment to the amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks for a separate vote on his amendment, and demands the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. SMALL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 19 having voted in the affirmative.

Mr. POTTER. I ask for a division of the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 118, noes 44.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of privilege and move to reconsider the last vote.

The SPEAKER. The House is acting as in Committee of the Whole, and the gentleman's motion is not in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe tellers were not demanded on the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. They were not.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I demand them.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is too late.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's demand comes too late. The demand for tellers on the yeas and nays must be made before the vote is declared. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts is adopted.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move the following substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates shall be at the rate of $6,000 per annum, payable monthly; and in addition thereto the actual individual expenses of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in coming to and returning from the seat of Government once in each session, to be certified in writing by each.

SEC. 2. That the compensation of the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall be at the rate of $2,000 in addition to his pay as Representative, amounting in all to $8,000; and that of the Vice-President shall be the same amount, with the same allowance for traveling expenses as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is required to cover into the Treasury all sums which may remain undrawn, or which have been received as increased compensation under the provisions of said act approved March 3, 1873, and which shall have or may come into his possession by the return thereof.

Mr. HURLBUT. On that substitute I demand the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to debate it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. DAWES. I have a right to debate it in opposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. DAWES. But he has not the floor to move the previous question against my debating the amendment.

Mr. HURLBUT. I rise to demand the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to debate the question.

Mr. HURLBUT. I ask whether, on the demand being made for the previous question, the vote is not to be taken upon my proposition without debate?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a question of order. Is not the House acting under an agreement that whenever the majority of the House shall so determine it can stop debate and proceed to vote?

The SPEAKER. The House is acting under an order for debate as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule—one speech for and one against any proposition.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But with this limitation, put on by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] having charge of the bill—that when a majority of the House shall so determine it can stop debate and proceed to vote by seconding the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Certainly; but not until the member who has a right to speak against the amendment has been heard.

Mr. HURLBUT. In that case, Mr. Speaker, I understand my demand for the previous question is not now directly operative, and I will say two or three words in support of the proposition I have had the honor to present to the House. It appears to me that we have wasted a great deal of valuable time in various motions.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Permit me to make a parliamentary inquiry. There is misapprehension in regard to this matter. The gentleman demanded the previous question and yielded the floor; and I understand the Speaker to decide that it is now in order to speak in opposition to the substitute.

Mr. HURLBUT. I am going on now to discuss my amendment.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman is entitled to five minutes for that purpose.

Mr. HURLBUT. I urge upon the House the importance of coming to some straightforward, practical principle. This miserable question of salaries has been occupying time of the House which ought to have been devoted to the public business. The time of the people has been wasted in all manner of explanations, needed and not needed; and I desire now, as rapidly as possible, that the House may come to a clear, distinct vote on a practical proposition looking to an adjustment of this great question. Now, if I have a right to call the previous question I will do so.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed the bill of the House (H. R. No. 482) to correct the enrollment of an act entitled "An act for the relief of P. W. Standefer."

REVISION OF SALARIES—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the salary bill.

Mr. HURLBUT. I desire to reserve three minutes after moving the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot do that under the rule. He has five minutes to speak in favor of the amendment. Five minutes are then allowed for a reply; and then there will be a vote on the substitute, if the House shall second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HURLBUT. I am opposed to the pending bill because it undertakes to mix up questions which ought to be separated; because it is a part of that system of log-rolling legislation which has injured the reputation of Congress more than anything else. And I desire to state to the House that when our hands shall have been made clean, I will then go just as far in the pursuit of a rigid economy in all the other branches of the Government as the gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, or the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] who has somewhat loaded a practicable bill with impracticable and improvident propositions.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to offer an amendment to the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Illinois, according to the ruling under which the House is acting, has a right to have the previous question operating on his own amendment.

Mr. BECK rose.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to say to the House, in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. BECK. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts rose to propose an amendment which was not in order. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and submit that I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I also rose to oppose the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Massachusetts cannot deprive the gentleman from Kentucky of the floor on that ground, having risen to offer an amendment which was not in order.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman has spoken ten times on this bill; I wish to speak on it once.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, after the exhaustive presentation of the law and the precedents by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON,] and others, proving the acts of March last to be not only legal but in strict accordance with all former acts, it would be mere repetition if I should attempt to say more on that branch of the subject; and I think it has been made equally clear that the members of the last Congress were not only entitled to the same increase of compensation which was provided for the members of the present Congress, but their right to determine the measure of compensation was, perhaps, strictly speaking, confined to the then existing Congress. When an amendment was proposed in 1816, providing that the increased compensation should not apply to the then existing Congress, Mr. Clay said:

> As to the amendment to defer its operation until the next Congress, he would remark that, in his judgment, there was more propriety in the law ending than beginning there. It was more respectful to our successors to leave them free to determine what was the just measure of indemnity for their expenses than for us to prescribe the rule for them. We can best judge for ourselves. With respect to the supposed delicacy of our fixing upon our own compensation, let the Constitution, let the necessity of the case, be reproached for that, not us.

I have never had the slightest doubt as to my right to draw and retain the increased pay for the last and the present Congress, and I am glad to say all the Kentucky members, both of the last and the present Congress, and our Senators as well, have done the same; to have done otherwise would have been an imputation on the integrity of men whose memories are sacred with us. Mr. Clay, Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Guthrie, Mr. Davis, and many others equally honest and almost equally illustrious as they, had done precisely what we have done. The Kentucky Legislature in March, 1867, increased their own pay not less than 40 per cent., taking back pay from 1865. Many of the most eminent men in the State were in that Legislature, and while some few of them have seen fit to criticise our action they have only exposed their own inconsistency.

Having always believed that liberal compensation secures faithful and efficient service in all employments, public and private, I never considered $7,500 a year, with the burdens imposed upon us by the abolition of the franking privilege and the deduction of all mileage and other perquisites, more than a reasonable compensation for the services of such men as the people ought to send here; indeed, I am not sure that it is much better than the old law. I am officially advised by the superintendent of the folding-room that the postage on the same books we received last Congress will amount to $1,945.68, to say nothing of speeches, miscellaneous documents, and other correspondence. I, however, opposed the passage of the bill of last March as a political blunder up to the moment when I saw a greater political danger staring us in the face than the passage of the appropriation bill of which the salary act was a part.

The constant struggle of the democratic party had been to show to the country that the extravagant expenditures of the Administration, and the enormous and unjust taxation imposed to sustain them, had rendered a change of policy and of rulers absolutely necessary and it seemed to me very impolitic for democrats to do anything which might even seem like increasing the burdens of the people for their own personal benefit. The increase of pay was of course a republican measure. That party had not only a decided majority in both Houses, but the committees by which it was reported, brought before the House, and ingrafted into the general appropriation bill, as well as the conference committee of the two Houses, were all two-thirds republican. Without the aid of that machinery the proposition never could have reached either House of Congress.

It seemed to me to be a blunder for democrats to aid them in doing so in any form, or so to vote as to weaken our attacks upon the supporters of the Administration where we knew they were weakest—in their reckless and wasteful expenditure of the public money and the taxation consequent thereon. But when the last hours of the session had arrived and the conference committee of the two Houses reported the bills which contained all the appropriations for the support and maintenance of the executive, legislative, and judicial expenses of the Government, with the increased salary clause embraced; when the Senate had rejected the proposed change to $6,500 and had insisted on $7,500; when no division of the vote could be had and no time remained for any further conference, even if a hope for change existed, another, a very serious, question was presented. If the bill failed, an immediate extra session of Congress was inevitable, and no thoughtful, well-informed democrat, especially among those of us who were re-elected, could look to that contingency with any but the most gloomy forebodings. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] who had opposed the increase of salaries in the few moments allowed him before the vote was taken on the conference report, expressed my views fully. He said:

> But while, in these particulars, I do not favor the report of the conference committee, I think it would be a very great misfortune—greater than any which may result from the injustice of fixing these salaries as proposed by the report—to have an extra session brought about by reason of the failure of this House to agree to this conference report even as it is. I can hardly conceive anything more unfortunate for the public Treasury than an extra session of the Forty-third Congress—the House of Representatives of which will have a republican majority of more than two-thirds—to take up the measures of legislation embraced in this bill, and proceed to such other legislation as they may. * * * * * *
> With reference to the next Congress, I cannot feel much confidence. I should, therefore, fear that transferring such measures of legislation from this Congress to the next, so far from leading to a saving to the public Treasury, will, no matter how objectionable this present bill as reported from the committee of conference may be, prove the very reverse. For myself, much as I object to this conference report, I shall hesitate before I take the responsibility, if it comes to that, of bringing on an extra session by rejecting this report.

My experience has taught me that in these hurried March sessions all the most mischievous legislation was enacted. I have seen the reconstruction, or rather destruction, of eleven States accomplished in March, 1867. In March, 1869, I saw the bondholders take possession of Congress and rob the people out of untold millions; in March, 1871, I saw the vested rights of the several States almost, if not totally, destroyed by Federal interference with and control over their elections under pretense of enforcing the fourteenth amendment; and all the Ku-Klux investigation and political persecution inaugurated when the House had not even a committee organized to consider or report upon anything; and I saw in March last the republican party, more overwhelming in strength, more united in purpose, more overbearing and arrogant than I had ever seen them before, while the democratic party was not only overwhelmed and dispirited, but by reason of our divisions and wrangles over the Greeley and O'Conner movements, it was doubtful whether we could rally what little resisting force we nominally had.

President Grant, flushed with such a victory, was then absolute master of the situation. Many of his strongest party leaders had fallen because of their disobedience; others, and especially new men, were certain not to take any risks by attempting to oppose him in anything. It was absolutely certain that the President and his Postmaster-General would promptly and vigorously urge (as they now do) the postal-telegraph scheme and the Government savings-banks, while cheap transportation in the form of railroads under Federal patronage, vast national educational schemes and civil-rights bills, utterly subverting State authority and law, to say nothing of the obvious combinations to support the then staggering and now bankrupt Northern Pacific and Southern Pacific Railroads, with all their kindred measures in combination, which would have been rapidly pressed and surely passed—measures which would have so centralized and consolidated Federal power and increased Executive authority and patronage as to have rendered a change of administration impossible.

The old republican members who had been defeated or had retired were all here, ready and anxious to bring all their influence to bear on their successors to induce them to sustain any measures the administration might desire, and claim the offices to be distributed by the President during his new term as the reward of their subserviency and zeal; in short, for those of us who had to remain and struggle against such schemes, and make a show of resistance to such odds, nothing could be so gloomy and so hopeless as the certainty of an extra session of Congress under such circumstances. I have no doubt all these measures, fraught with so much of evil, some of which I see looming up now, would have become laws within six weeks if this Congress had met in March last. Their pernicious effects upon the country cannot be estimated in money; but the mere mileage and expenses of an extra session would have cost more than the increased compensation for this and the last Congress, leaving the legislation out of the question.

In view of all these things, when the final vote was taken in the last hours of the session, when several of my Kentucky colleagues who had steadily opposed the increase of salary up to that moment voted for the bill, I declined to vote against it, and determined to take whatever of responsibility that course should involve; and I state now, notwithstanding all the furor of the press and the politicians, that it was wiser and better to pass that bill than to have this Congress assemble in extra session in March last. We are numerically no stronger now than we were in March; but we are now a compact, organized force, supported by a hopeful and united party. Then we were disorganized skirmishers, with no assurance that we could act in unison or that we had any organized party in the country to fall back upon after defeat. The retiring place-hunters of the old Congress are now gone, most of them disappointed and soured because they have not been provided for. The hopeless bankruptcy of the vast railroad corporations, whose schemes could not have been resisted then, is now apparent. The country is more jealous and watchful of its finances, and hope is springing up out of the development of the wasteful extravagance which has brought the country to the verge of ruin.

I fully understand why the venal portion of the press and the lower order of pettifogging politicians have inflamed the minds of the people against their Representatives and sought to destroy that confidence which is so essential an element in the usefulness of a member of Congress. Small men, without merit, can only reach a respectable level by pulling down those above them. Envy is the meanest of our low passions. It is nurtured in the heart of a brainless wretch by "worth in others, meanness in himself." The most abandoned woman does not gloat over, or roll as a sweet morsel under her tongue, the calumnies whispered against a virtuous lady more than the pot-house politician does the charges of a venal scribbler against a reputable public man.

Only two classes of men can remain in Congress without adequate compensation: those who are so wealthy that salary is not only no object, but who have their banks, their bonds, their monopolies, or their subsidies to protect against honest legislation, and who can afford to buy their place from venal constituents or Legislatures in order to tax the toiling millions to enrich themselves; the other class comprises the corrupt hounds who sell their votes, degrade the country, sacrificing their honor and the interest of their constituents whenever by so doing they can put money into their own pockets. These classes can serve here for nothing. Kentucky never sent either of them, and I trust she never will; honest people do not want either if they know it. They want men who have no interest in legislation except the public good; and they ought to be made to pay a fair recompense for the services of men of ability, so that poverty should never be an obstacle to the acceptance of public position by men of talent and integrity. If disinterested men of integrity and capacity could be excluded from the legislative halls, the lobby rings, which I fear too many of the scribblers for the press are paid to aid and sustain, would have but little trouble in consummating their schemes of plunder on the Treasury.

I had hoped, when public attention was aroused and excited over the so-called salary grab, that all the other legislation which has depleted the Treasury, crippled the resources of the country, or sapped the foundations of the Government, would, with equal diligence, be inquired into. If that had been done I would have felt, however much I may have been abused personally, that good results would follow, but I have been disappointed.

The recklessly extravagant expenditures in all the Departments of the Government; the immense sums wrongly given to bondholders; the monopolies to the banks and other great corporations; the unjust tariff taxation; even the destruction of the rights of States and peoples, and all the schemes of centralization of executive power, are not only not commented on unfavorably, but are even highly commended, by many of those who are loudest in denouncing in every form of billingsgate what they choose to call the "salary steal." In many instances these great robberies and usurpations are in part their own, and, like the Artful Dodger, they raise the "hue and cry" of thief against honest men to divert attention from themselves. The nervousness of the House shows how well they understand human nature.

No man can honestly assert that a salary of $7,500 is more than a faithful Representative is worth. The services he is compelled to render to individuals outside of his public duties in Congress would at the lowest rate of compensation charged by attorneys for like services amount to $7,500 a year. Sir, a Representative cannot board his wife and two children (and that is not a large average family) for $500 a month at any hotel in Washington, and every man knows that he cannot engage in his profession successfully during the recess of Congress; indeed, if he does his duty, it will require every moment of his time to acquire a knowledge of the great questions which he is compelled to grapple with while here. How to raise $350,000,000 of revenue annually, and how to distribute it so as not to oppress or defraud the people; how to preserve and maintain their rights from the encroachments of power; how to protect commerce and agriculture in a contest with all the nations of the earth, are not themes for school-boys. Trained men, with all the intellect, industry, and energy they can bring to bear, can hardly master them. Only such are fit to be here. It is the fault of the people if they do not send such, and they ought to pay for their services what they are worth when they send them.

Still I will obey instructions. My opinion in a matter of the amount of compensation ought not, I suppose, to control my action against the will of the people when expressed (whether on careful consideration or not) in the way in which popular opinions are usually expressed, and I shall, against my judgment of what is for the best interest of the country, vote for a return to the rate of compensation fixed before the law of March last was passed. I will refund whatever I am required to pay by any law that may be passed. I want it to be distinctly understood that I will not pay back one dollar except as provided by law. I consider that I have rendered the country and my constituents services at least equal to all the money I have received. So believing, I shall keep what the law does not take from me.

Mr. HURLBUT. I now insist on the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to say that if the previous question is voted down I will offer as an amendment the bill reported back by the committee under the instructions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire the previous question on his substitute only, or on the substitute and the bill?

Mr. HURLBUT. Upon the whole.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask the gentleman to insert $5,500 instead of $6,000.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman to make another modification.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object to debate.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman to take the bill reported by the committee under the instructions of the House.

Mr. HURLBUT. Mine is a substitute for the bill.

Mr. DAWES. Let it be read.

The Clerk read Mr. HURLBUT's amendment, as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates shall be at the rate of $6,000 per annum, payable monthly, and in addition thereto the actual individual expenses of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in going to and returning from the seat of Government once in each session, to be certified in writing by each.

SEC. 2. That the compensation of the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall be at the rate of $3,000 in addition to his pay as Representative, amounting in all to $9,000; and that of the Vice-President shall be the same amount, with the same allowance for traveling expenses as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is required to cover into the Treasury all sums that may remain undrawn, or which have been received as increased compensation, under the provisions of said act approved March 3, 1873, and which shall have or may come into his possession by the return thereof.

Mr. DAWES. I make the point of order that that amendment has been altered since it was submitted and debated and the previous question called upon it.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has not yet been ordered.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman made a motion for the previous question, and after having submitted an amendment and having it debated on both sides, he is not at liberty, without the knowledge of the House, to go and alter it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How does the gentleman know the fact?

Mr. DAWES. I rise to debate it in its present form.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It involves a question of fact.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois whether it was fair, after having submitted an amendment to the House in one form, debated it himself in that form, and received debate in opposition to it, then, unknown to the House, to go to the Clerk's desk and alter that amendment, and call the previous question upon it without informing the House of that fact. Now, I have to say to the House that if they will vote down the previous question I will offer as a substitute for the gentleman's proposition the bill reported back to the House by the committee under the instructions submitted by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] and then, as soon as I can under the rules, I will call the previous question. If the House will then adopt that as a substitute for the amendment which the gentleman from Illinois has felt it his duty to put in the shape he has, then they will come to a direct vote between his bill and the bill as it came from the committee, under the deliberate instructions of the House after full debate.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the gentleman takes his seat, will he tell us in what the alteration that has been made in the amendment consists?

Mr. DAWES. I will tell the gentleman. It is in striking out "$2,000" for the Speaker and putting in "$3,000" for the Speaker, and putting in the same thing for the Vice-President of the United States; and I submit that, however right that may be in principle, he has no right, because he does not know the opinion of this House, to make that alteration. I will not say that it was a fraud upon the House, for I am willing to believe that the gentleman from Illinois had not the slightest intention of that kind; but under such a practice as that there can be no safety in legislation, and it ought not to be tolerated for one moment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to debate the bill now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be obliged to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] if he will leave his amendment in its original shape.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not until I have spoken upon it.

Mr. HURLBUT. I hope the House will hear me say a few words in the nature of a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be exceedingly obliged to the gentleman from Illinois if he will put his amendment in its original shape, although it reduces the Speaker's salary $500. He asks as a special favor that that be done. From the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] it might possibly be inferred by some persons that the Speaker might have been privy to the alteration. The language of the gentleman was susceptible of that construction.

Mr. DAWES. O, no, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs as a personal favor of each member of the House that before the amendment is submitted it shall be as it was originally offered, and the Chair will regard any gentleman who objects as having malice toward him.

Mr. DAWES. The Chair of course knows, for he knows me, that I did not intend anything of that sort.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the gentleman intended it; but he thought the language might be so construed. It would relieve the House, it would relieve the gentleman from Illinois, and it would relieve the Chair to have the amendment put in the shape in which it was originally offered.

Mr. DAWES. Of course the Chair knows that I did not intend to cast any such imputation, and if any remark I have made may have left such an impression it was the widest thing possible from my intention; but I know how the thing was done and by what counsel it was done.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have a word to say now, with the leave of the Chair. It has always been the practice in all Congresses to fix, as I understand it, the salary of the Speaker of the House and of the Vice-President at a rate greater by one-half than that of a member. I observed that by inadvertence, without intending it, the gentleman from Illinois had brought down the salary of the Speaker below that rate. And while I knew that the Speaker would not care anything about it as a matter of money, yet I supposed he would not like to have it said that the House of Representatives over which he presided had deliberately cut down his salary as the only one. Therefore I went to the gentleman from Illinois, suggested the fact to him, and said to him, "Your amendment being in your own hands and a vote not having been taken upon it you have a right to alter it." That is the counsel and advice under which the gentleman acted.

Mr. DAWES. So I supposed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I know you supposed so; you certainly had nothing to do with it yourself.

Mr. WHEELER. I rise to a point of order. I suggest that the modification made by the gentleman from Illinois was void from the beginning, he having himself moved the previous question, and that while that was pending he had no power to modify his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The point of order of the gentleman from New York is a purely abstract one, as the gentleman will see when the amendment is read. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates shall be at the rate of $6,000 per annum, payable monthly, and in addition thereto the actual individual expenses of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in going to and returning from the seat of Government once in each session, to be certified in writing by each.

SEC. 2. That the compensation of the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall be at the rate of $2,000 in addition to his pay as Representative, amounting in all to $8,000; and that of the Vice-President shall be the same amount, with the same allowance for traveling expenses as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is required to cover into the Treasury all sums that may remain undrawn, or which have been received as increased compensation, under the provisions of said act approved March 3, 1873, and which shall have or may come into his possession by the return thereof.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will please act as tellers on the question of seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to a question of privilege. I wish to ask the Speaker, with the greatest respect, to withdraw the remark with which he accompanied his request that nobody would object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does withdraw it. However, it applied to no gentleman, for no gentleman objected.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] would have to stand in the Speaker's place to realize the peculiar embarrassment which the situation threw around him. It put him in an attitude possibly of conniving in some way at an increase of his salary. He can stand a reduction; but not an increase.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I sympathized most cordially with the feeling of the Chair, and respected it; but I am sure that the present occupant of the Chair knows that no man respects him more highly than I do. I do think the Chair ought not to say to the House, in determining whether objection should or should not be made, that he would regard any member who objected as having personal malice against himself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair himself knows that the expression was warm, and he regretted it afterward; it escaped his lips without sufficient consideration. But the gentleman from Massachusetts will observe that the proposition was one affecting the present occupant of the Chair only; and no member in objecting could have any other object than in some way to control the action of the Speaker. If the proposition had been one of more general application, the Chair would not have made the remark he did; and he joins the gentleman from Massachusetts in the regret that he did make it.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I wish to know whether the Chair intends to say that if we fix the compensation of the Speaker of the House of Representatives for the future, that is a matter which only concerns the present occupant of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. No, sir; and the Chair will be very much obliged to the gentleman offering the amendment if he will modify it so as to limit its operation to the present occupant of the Chair.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to renew my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is good.

Mr. WHEELER. I wished a ruling upon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it not an almost every-day practice for members to go to the Clerk's desk and make verbal alterations in their amendments before they are voted upon?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the rule. In Committee of the Whole a gentleman cannot withdraw an amendment without unanimous consent; nor can he modify it, because that may make it an entirely new amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the practice is——

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but practice by general consent is not consistent with the rule of the House. According to the strict rule of the House, the gentleman had no right to modify his amendment; under the practice of the House, he had.

The House divided upon seconding the previous question; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 141, noes 48.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was: "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. DAWES. Upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 41 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] desire to close the debate?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not want time of any consequence for myself; but I have agreed that certain gentlemen shall have a part of my time.

Mr. SPEER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not yield for that. The hour for closing debate is after the main question has been ordered?

The SPEAKER. That is for the election of the gentleman. He can take it now, or after the main question shall have been ordered.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will take it after the main question has been passed upon.

The question was then taken upon ordering the main question; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 167, nays 105, not voting 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Albright, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Biery, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burrows, Benjamin F. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Bland, Hersey, Lamison, McKee, Mitchell, Purman, James C. Robinson, Sheats, William A. Smith, Stephens, St. John, and Tremain—13.

So the main question was ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was communicated to the House by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 481) making appropriations for extraordinary expenses of the naval service.

SALARY BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the salary bill.

Mr. SPEER. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the House shall adjourn now, the previous question having been ordered upon the pending bill and amendments, will not this bill come up for action the first thing to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It will.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn; and it was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The main question having been ordered, the first question is upon the substitute moved by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] for the bill as amended by the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. And on that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 130, not voting 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Barrere, Barry, Beck, Begole, Biery, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Buffinton, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Bland, John B. Clark, jr., Gooch, Hersey, Hooper, Kellogg, Kendall, Lamison, Mitchell, Purman, James C. Robinson, Sheats, William A. Smith, Stephens, St. John—16.

So the substitute of Mr. HURLBUT was agreed to.

Mr. CESSNA. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. O, no!

The motion of Mr. HOLMAN was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. CESSNA,

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; there being ayes 23, noes not counted.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CESSNA, it was agreed to.

So the motion to reconsider the vote by which the substitute of Mr. HURLBUT was adopted was agreed to.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion, it was declared not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; there being ayes 8, noes not counted.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I rise to close debate.

Many MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Members are very much more anxious to vote just now than they have been heretofore.

Mr. CESSNA. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Maine has waived his right to close the debate. He ought to have commenced his remarks immediately after the main question was ordered and before any other question was taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the point of order that the gentleman from Maine is not entitled to an hour, because the proposition he made has been voted down, whereby he loses the right to control the bill as it now stands.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that that deprives the gentleman of his hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that the gentleman reporting a bill is entitled to close the debate, simply because courtesy demands that he should have the control of his own bill. The bill as now amended is not the bill of the gentleman from Maine, nor the bill of the committee; it is the bill of the House.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman will observe that although the House has amended the bill in certain respects, non constat that the House will pass the bill as amended.

Mr. RANDALL. The House has adopted a substitute.

The SPEAKER. Still it is an amendment, though in the nature of a substitute. Neither the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] nor any one else can affirm that the House will pass the bill as amended. That is by no means a necessary consequence. The Chair holds that the gentleman who reported the bill has the right to the closing hour of debate.

Mr. RANDALL. As the Chair has overruled that point, I make another, that the previous question is partly executed.

The SPEAKER. It might be executed so far as the amendment is concerned, and still the gentleman be entitled to speak on the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Then, when we reach the main question on the bill the gentleman can speak, but not before.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time. If the previous question has been executed with regard to the amendment it does not prevent the gentleman from speaking on the main question of engrossing the bill as amended. The two questions are distinct propositions. There might have been half a dozen amendments agreed to under the operation of the previous question, and then after those were disposed of the gentleman might speak on the question whether the bill as amended shall be ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the Speaker rule that the gentleman is entitled to an hour after the previous question has been partly executed?

The SPEAKER. The previous question has not been executed at all on this question. The question now pending is, Shall this bill as amended be engrossed and read the third time?

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that the gentleman from Maine has been twice defeated by an overwhelming vote of this House when he has called the previous question. The practice heretofore has been—and I do not wish to come into collision with the Speaker's decision—the practice has been heretofore, I say, when the member having charge of a bill was voted down, that the contrary side then had control of the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will observe that this does not present the case he has in his mind. There may be a series of amendments to a bill, and the gentleman who reports the bill may be opposed to this, that, or the other one of the amendments, but gentlemen cannot infer that the bill will be passed or will not be passed. It is a matter now open for debate.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not infer anything. I look to the facts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appreciates with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the House is very impatient for a vote. Does the gentleman from Maine insist on his right to speak?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do insist.

Mr. POTTER. I hope the gentleman will yield for a motion to adjourn.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The House has shown clearly that it wants to go on and finish up this business, and I shall have little to say. I remember an occasion, not a year ago, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was just as greedily clamorous that debate should be shut off as he now is. I, for one, have not pestered the House with debate on the different bills which have been before it; but have been so anxious that the House should come to a direct vote upon substantial repeal that I have waived any right to speak here that may have belonged to me in having charge of the two bills that the salary committee have reported to this body; and I will say for the edification of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that I do not propose now to take up much time. Before my hour is out I shall say in a few words why it is I believe that the measure now before the House is not a substantial repeal but an evasion, an attempt to make out of the long delay and botched condition in which amendments have left the committee's bill a little money to put in our purses.

But I do not here propose to go on. I have agreed to give up certain of my time, and I yield now for fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. RANDALL. O, let us vote.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. To that I say, in view of the temper of the House, I shall not take it, although I have devoted no hour or moment to debate.

MEMBERS from various parts of the House. Let us vote.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I rise to a parliamentary question for my own information, and that is whether or not the gentleman from Maine having given up the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and he having refused to avail himself of the floor, in view of the temper of the House, that does not settle the question whether or not we shall have further debate?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine must determine that for himself.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I shall be careful not to trespass upon the indulgence of the House; but I have certain privileges, and those privileges I shall surely claim. I shall not be cried nor howled down.

Everybody, Mr. Speaker, I think will admit that the passage of the salary bill on last March was unfortunate and inopportune. If there had been any doubt upon that question the almost unanimous voice of the people settled it. And, sir, it was a matter upon which the people might well pass—it was the voting of money from the public purse to pay public servants. Now, there can be no question as to that being a subject-matter which the people might consider. There can be no question as to what was the result of that consideration. It was sharp, swift, and immediate condemnation, and it was so marked and so undoubted that I see no humiliation on the part of any gentleman here following that direction of the people on this subject-matter. I, of course, feel no humiliation. I have no back track to take, no new record to make; but I do not, from this comfortable stand-point, gloat over the gentlemen who have changed their views because there was the best reason for change. The people passed upon the subject they had a right to pass upon. The contract for pay, and this is the fair formula to put it in, was a two-sided contract, and the party paying the money vetoed the bill involving the increase. The public stamped its disapproval upon it, and, therefore, I see no inconsistency on the part of gentlemen like the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] taking ground now in favor of substantial repeal, as that gentleman here assures us he does.

He has been instructed on a matter where he originally voted as he pleased, subject to the disapproval of the other contracting party, and, therefore, I repeat again there is no humiliation here in responding on this question to the people's voice.

Now, sir, I cannot vote for the proposition which is at present before the House, because I believe that it is an evasion of the public demand. It evades our instructions from our constituencies, whose money we are passing upon. The people have decided in favor of substantial repeal. There have been gentlemen enough here, who within the last ten days have reiterated this proposition, to carry it if they will vote as they have talked. But the proposition before the House is not repeal simon-pure. This House has already passed upon it that it is not. Less than a week ago—on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH]—this whole matter was committed to the special committee, with instructions to report a repeal of the salary increase, so far as the same was practicable under the Constitution, and to go back to the old salary and allowances; but instead of these allowances being unfairly distributed, as was the case under the mileage law, to lump the mileage and average it among the members as salary. The committee reported such an equalizing bill to this House. It involved substantial repeal. It took no more money from the Treasury than the old law. It equalized mileage, not as I would rather have seen it done, from the pockets of members who draw excessive mileage, into the Treasury, but from the pockets of one member into that of another. But so far as that goes, it was one kind of equalization. I, for one, was willing to stand to it, and the committee reported a bill fixing the salaries at $5,500, the $500 over the old law being the average amount of mileage and stationery allowances.

I tried to bring the House to vote upon that proposition. I was in favor, as I have been from the beginning, of not incumbering bills that carried repeal on their forefront with anything that would clog them. But I could get no direct vote on the proposition, though members enough would talk for it.

And now, sir, after the House has voted first upon one thing and then another; after it has instructed its committee to fix our salaries at $5,500, right in the face of the report of the committee a proposition is put in here by which at the end of a fortnight's hard fighting, with the eyes of everybody upon us, we seek to get out of the fray by increasing our salaries in the sum of $500.

Sir, it is not the amount that the people will care about. It was not, as has been often stated in this discussion, any particular sum that awakened the country last spring, but it was the conduct of the business that roused the people; and to-day, sir, this House cannot afford, as the upshot of all this agony for "repeal," to again increase our salaries over the old figure and negative the idea of repeal. Sir, the people do not expect that from us. They expect us to go back to the old law or to its equivalent. Is there any gentleman here that can give us a reason why we should add $500 to what we formerly received? And, what is the worst of it, no option is given us in voting. The gentleman from Illinois who springs this proposition refuses to allow me to move an amendment inserting $5,500 for $6,000, and refuses to allow the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to offer as a substitute the bill reported by the select committee.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. The first bill reported by the committee provided that the salaries should be fixed at $5,000 a year, I believe. The gentleman from Maine was chairman of that committee. It also restored the mileage after this session, which he reported, in submitting the bill yesterday, amounted on an average to $500 a year, which for a Congress amounts to $1,000; consequently is not the bill which has been voted upon substantially the bill reported by the committee in the first place?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The bill as reported by myself at first involved direct repeal in terms, and nothing else. It did restore the mileage in terms, just as it was, because I believed that would be satisfactory to the public, as it would be clean repeal. The second bill takes the same money from the Treasury——

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I cannot yield. The other proposition, as I have said, takes the same money from the Treasury and equalizes it into the pockets of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, Maryland, and other States near around, and takes it away from those farther off.

Now, in reply to the question of the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] as to the amount of mileage, let me say the amount for a whole Congress is undoubtedly nearly $1,000, but we are dealing with annual salaries, not with the salaries for a term. Why, sir, the committee reporting that bill strained as far and as hard as it could so that members might be satisfied.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I decline to yield. The Forty-first Congress had three sessions. The present Congress has but two. The Forty-first Congress had an extra session in March, another session commencing the following December, and the third commencing in December of its last year. The committee, in making the calculation by which it arrived at $5,500, was sent by the mover of that resolution to that Congress. It aggregated all of that mileage for the three sessions. Gentlemen see that we can have but two mileages, but every new member coming into that Congress had three mileages.

That was my first Congress, and I had three mileages, because I came here in March to the first session, and drew actual mileage as others did; and there were about seventy-five members of that Congress who had three mileages. But the committee, seeing no better way of doing it, lumped the whole of those mileages for the two years, and divided it by two, and reported it to the House, so that it should not be said that it had discriminated against members. It did not exceed its warrant; but it had reason to suppose that its liberality would be respected and appreciated.

And now, upon the heels of this, a scheme is set about for more salary, and no amendment is allowed to be offered lessening the sum; and when a member gets up here on the floor to lift his voice and protest against this bill, there are members—I hope and believe but few—who want to crowd him down, and shout him down, and who cry, "Vote," "Vote." Sir, that is not what the American Congress in its better days—and I am not one of those who are inclined to decry the present day in congressional legislation—was accustomed to see. I have the right to protest against this bill, and I have given in brief, yet longer than I intended, certain good reasons why it is that I cannot vote for it. If it goes to the wall, I pledge myself for one—and there are many here who will uphold me in the enterprise—to introduce a measure involving a clean, straightforward, substantial repeal on the first Monday ensuing, and then I know or believe that gentlemen will pass it, and satisfy a watchful and intelligent people. I yield now ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. NEGLEY. I would like to ask the gentlemen from Maine a question. I desire to know whether he intends the remark he made at the close of his speech as a threat to this House to drive them to the adoption of the measure which he espouses so warmly?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman is very sensitive about threats. I made no threat.

Mr. NEGLEY. I am sensitive about threats coming from the chairman of a committee which was appointed to deal impartially with this whole question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to ask one question.

Mr. DAWES. I have not time to yield.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have yielded ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman yield me two minutes of that ten?

Mr. RANDALL. What is the custom about yielding the floor? Has the gentleman from Maine a right to yield it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that right.

Mr. DAWES. I want to say in the beginning that gentlemen do not understand the rule. I have no time to yield to anybody. It is the gentleman from Maine who has the hour, and he has yielded to me for ten minutes, not to yield to any one else. I do not desire one moment of the time of the House to offer any new argument upon this subject. I simply desire to put myself upon record, and to give the reason why I cannot vote for the proposition.

I say here, lest I should forget it, that if this measure shall fail I pledge myself at the first opportunity to introduce the bill reported under the instructions of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] and to ask a vote on that bill in the very words in which this House instructed the committee to make that report. The reason why I cannot vote for this bill is because it does not undo what we did last March. The scene this evening is but a repetition of the scene last March; and when I sat in my seat struggling to be heard I was met then with the same treatment that the gentleman from Maine has received here on this occasion.

Sir, as history repeats itself now, so it will repeat itself in the judgment of the people upon this transaction. I was willing to bide my time. I am willing to-day to bide my time in the struggle I have endeavored, with all sincerity, to make to undo the unfortunate work of last March, without recrimination, with no unkind word or imputation of unworthy motives to individual members. I have no such imputations to make upon any member here now. I only say, sir, that the bill is so unfortunate in its position that I cannot vote for it; and it is unfortunate that, by nearly one hundred majority, we decided to undo, so far as the Constitution would permit us to do it, the unfortunate work of last March; and we went on until, falling into the same error we fell into last March, by an unfortunate lead we put upon this bill unfortunate amendments; and then it is unfortunate that we took the back track in all our votes upon the bill to give ourselves $500 a year. That is one reason why I cannot vote for it. Of course every other member of this House will judge for himself. I judge no man. I cannot be induced, for one, to say to the country that I will let all the other salaries remain untouched, and will go back and attempt even to repeal my own salary provided I can pocket $500 by the operation. I cannot do it, sir, and I will not do it. Other gentlemen, of course, will judge for themselves. I say to them, the country is capable of judging, and can discern the difference between the measure you gave the go-by to a moment ago and the measure you substituted for it. They will not fail to do it. I say to gentlemen that I for one wash my hands of this proceeding. I shall go against this measure, and will on the next Monday we are in session, if no one else gets the start of me, offer to this House once more the opportunity to undo all they did in this unfortunate measure of last March, so far as the Constitution will permit them to do it.

Mr. HALE. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] for five minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Gentlemen will remember that I have from the first deprecated this debate. I was anxious on the first morning when the bill was introduced that we should come to a vote without debate, for I foresaw the debate would change no man's opinions—would be bitter and personal and valueless. It is clear that most men now regret that we did not silently and promptly vote to repeal the law increasing salaries. I have constantly desired to have this debate closed and the vote taken. But I am unwilling that the vote should be now taken, after what has been said by my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] without a word or two in answer, and a statement of the reasons that will govern me in the vote I shall give.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I have voted in favor of a simple, plain, and sweeping repeal of all those clauses of the bill of last March which increased salaries except those of the judges of the Supreme Court. I have voted with both these gentlemen for all the principal amendments which have been offered to this bill. But I ask the House to pause and consider before we cast a negative vote on the proposition to reduce our salaries from $7,500 to $6,000. If any gentleman here in the name of economy wishes to say that we ought not to vote to reduce our salaries to $6,000, let him take the responsibility of saying it.

Mr. DAWES. Do not undertake——

Mr. GARFIELD. I do undertake to say that this is the exact fact in the case. If the next vote is in the negative the subject of repeal is ended and the committee is discharged. This is a result that the friends of reduced salaries cannot desire.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] whether the franking privilege of all documents not being restored, and which amounted in value to about $700, is not the proposed salary of $6,000 less by $200 than the salary received by members of the Forty-first Congress?

Mr. GARFIELD. That may be so; but it is not a part of my purpose to discuss that subject. I am opposed to the restoration of the franking privilege. But I am in favor of a plain and sweeping repeal of the law of March last, and a restoration of the old salaries, with the mileage equally distributed. I prefer, and shall at all times do what I can to secure the passage of the bill of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] as reported from the committee by the instruction of the House. But having helped my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] in the attempt to get just what he and I wanted to get, I shall not join him in his proposal to drop the whole subject and return here at the opening of the next year with nothing done, and only to re-enact the scenes of the last four days, and let all the great measures of public business go unheeded while the unseemly scramble to do nothing is fought over again as it has been fought for the past week.

The gentleman says that if we will only kill this bill, he pledges himself, on the first Monday in January after we meet, to bring in a bill that will go deeper than this does. Well, sir, let the gentleman bring in his deeper bill and I will help him pass it. But let us not postpone until another year what we can do now. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] that we ought to have included others than ourselves in this bill. But does not the gentleman know that the bill he promises to introduce, or the motion he promises to make, can be made in connection with the legislative appropriation bill, by a suspension of the rules, on the very Monday that he talks of? The very motion he now pledges the House to bring in he can make in connection with the legislative appropriation bill, when that shall be reported, and get the order of the House that it shall be in order to move upon that legislative appropriation the very amendment he desires.

But I am not willing to go upon the record to-day, and to remain before the country for the next three weeks, in the attitude of having voted against the only positive proposition left me—reduction of salaries.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I now yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] for five minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I wish merely to call the attention of the House to the fact that there is yet an opportunity for gentlemen who desire to vote for another bill, or a substitute for this, to do so. Before I sit down I will ask the Speaker to explain precisely where it comes in. I understand that when the previous question, which will be moved by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] shall have been defeated, then I or any other member will have the right to move that this bill be recommitted to the select committee, with instructions to report forthwith, that is, at the Clerk's desk, instantly, an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I will, if I have the opportunity, move the substitute which I hold in my hand, and that will test the sincerity of those gentlemen who have found fault with this $6,000 bill; for it proposes to reduce our pay to $5,500 a year from this date, and has reference only to Congressmen, and has in it the usual clause at the end about covering into the Treasury the back pay that has been returned; and it also gives us our actual traveling expenses, leaving out of consideration other officials whose salaries were increased by the law of last session. That is to say, it will strike out all after the enacting clause, and substitute as follows:

That all provisions in an act entitled "An act to provide for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873, that increase the salary or compensation of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates in Congress are hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That hereafter the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress shall be at the rate of $5,500 per annum; and this shall be in lieu of all allowances, except actual and necessary individual traveling expenses in coming to and returning from the national capital once each session, which shall be paid to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate, on the same being certified by him to the proper accounting officer.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is required to cover into the Treasury all sums that may remain undrawn, or which have been received as increased compensation under the provisions of said act approved March 3, 1873, and which shall have or may come into his possession by the return thereof.

I want this, because we voted to instruct the committee to report as the basis of our future salary what was the average annual profit of the old salary, aside from the franking privilege. The committee reported that, as near as they could make it out, the amount was $5,500. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] says that they stretched it a little to make that amount; others say they reduced a little; no matter about that, they reported $5,500 as the average. I would have voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] if he had placed the amount at $5,500. But having from the beginning to the end of this debate, and also to my constituents, said that I would go for the average of the old salary, I could not excuse myself to the country if I voted for a larger sum. To be sure you may say it is a small difference; but it amounts in the aggregate to nearly $200,000 a year; and we are very strong upon economy now. For that reason I am in favor of fixing the salary at $5,500; and I am very glad that there is still an opportunity to vote for it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] asks me why I do not take the whole bill as reported by the committee. I doubt my parliamentary power to do so; and then again I am unwilling to make the proposition, because I was opposed originally to including all those officers that are embraced in that bill. In some cases I was opposed to the reduction of salary; and I foresaw that if a bill like that of the committee were brought in, covering the whole field, then there would arise precisely the state of circumstances that has arisen: that gentlemen would object to including the salary of the President, or of the judges of the Supreme Court, (which you cannot affect except after a long time,) or of the Cabinet officers, or the Vice-President, or the Speaker, or some of the employés of Congress, and that thus the question what we should do with ourselves would be incumbered and embarrassed, so that the whole proposition for reduction of salaries would probably be defeated. And we came within a hair's breadth of that result; for we had the bill covered all over with amendments so odious that none of us dared to vote for it.

Now we come squarely to the plain, clear question, shall we members of Congress reduce our pay to the average of the old pay? That is what I am committed to; and at a proper time I shall offer an amendment which will accomplish that result.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Will that include the revival of the franking privilege?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. No, sir.

But, having no disguises on this subject, I am perfectly willing to say that I am in favor of an independent proposition which, while keeping the matter out of my control or that of any other member—while giving us no franking privilege with the chance of abusing it—will provide for sending public documents home to our constituents. I want this, in addition to the salary of $5,500. In a proper bill—not in this—I shall vote for such a proposition. As to the sending of documents, I do not want the control of the question left with members. I do not want to receive a salary of, say, $6,000, in consideration of expense for mailing documents, because then I may or may not spend the additional $500 in sending documents. Let the documents be sent by the Government that prints them to the people for whose benefit they are printed. I desire that of the money coming into my hands as compensation I may be able to say, "This money is my own; there is no equitable claim upon any part of it."

Let me say, further, that I do not believe any measure on this subject should be retroactive. All the propositions looking to retroaction have been (I will not say they were so intended) a farce calculated to defeat the whole measure. I do not believe in retroaction of any sort. Establish $5,500 as the salary of members, and then provide some way of sending documents to our constituents at the expense of the Government. Such a proposition I shall support at the proper time. If the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] had fixed the salary at $5,500 instead of $6,000 I should have voted for it. As it was, I was compelled to vote against it.

Mr. BURROWS. If the passage of the salary law of March 3, 1873, was so obnoxious to the American people and fraught with such disastrous consequences to the republican party, this protracted discussion over a proposition for its repeal, this hesitancy and debate, will only serve to heighten that odium and enhance that peril. The longer this discussion continues the less confidence will the people have in the sincerity of our professions or the good faith of our ultimate action. The longer we postpone a vote upon some measure embodying substantial repeal the less will be the merit accorded to our final conduct. That action which in the beginning would have been regarded as an evidence of public virtue may be so delayed as to be looked upon as inspired only by public necessity. If we hesitate much longer, when we do vote for repeal I fear the people will say of us, as was said of Cæsar when he put aside the proffered crown, "He would fain have had it. He was very loath to lay his fingers off it."

Why not act upon this question now and to-day? What is the question before us? The law under which members of the Forty-third Congress entered upon their congressional term fixed their compensation of $7,500. It is now proposed to repeal that law; and the only question of any vital importance is, what should the salary of a member of Congress be?

In determining this question no possible advantage can be derived from arraigning the members of the Forty-second Congress. Their act has gone into history. The question is with us, the responsibility is upon us, and we cannot shift it.

I believe the pay of all public servants, from the President to the most obscure postmaster, should be a fixed, definite sum of money, and not a farthing of perquisites. By doing this we shall clear up some of the most startling claims upon the public Treasury and shield ourselves from charges of corruption. For this reason I am unalterably opposed to any measure which proposes to restore the obnoxious mileage system. It is odious to the American people, and unjust to the members of this House.

In determining the question of our compensation there are certain well-recognized principles which should govern us.

I hold it to be a sound principle of compensation that the salary of a civil office should never be so high as to excite the cupidity of men and furnish an inducement to seek a place solely by reason of the pecuniary advantages it offers. Cash, and not capability, will then be the surest prerequisite of success. If the time shall ever come in the history of this country when the emoluments of office shall induce men whose only ambition in life is to accumulate wealth to seek political preferment as a means of satisfying their avarice, rest assured that we shall enter upon an era of corruption unparalleled in the history of the Republic, and it will be the sure precursor of our swift and complete overthrow.

The argument of the gentleman from Georgia was well suited to the aristocracies of the Old World, but will find little approval in the Republic of the New. But while in my judgment the compensation to public servants ought not to be so high as to induce men to seek place as a pecuniary investment, yet I deem it equally important that it should never be so low as to prevent the poorest citizen from holding any place under the Government. Hence I have no sympathy with the proposition to require service in any position without compensation. Such a course might exclude the first talent of the country, and would certainly throw legislation entirely into the hands of the rich and build up a moneyed aristocracy.

I make no question but there are giant corporations, fattening upon the substance of the people, which would hail the passage of a law taking away all compensation from members of Congress, that they might more successfully shape legislation in their interest. Under such a law you would find here no longer the representatives of the whole people, but the pliant retainers of a ruling class. Pay well, and then insist upon absolute integrity.

I think it clear that these two extremes should certainly be avoided.

Consulting the highest interests of the people, and not unmindful of our own necessities, I shall cheerfully vote for any bill which will virtually restore the old law of compensation stripped of every obnoxious feature. In my judgment, $5,500 will accomplish that result. In doing this I apprehend we shall fully satisfy the public demand and do that which is honorable to ourselves.

Let us act then to-day and now, that the country may be assured of our professions and have some substantial proof of retrenchment and reform.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BURROWS. I hope the gentleman will give me a moment longer.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Time is precious.

Mr. BURROWS. Let me have half a minute.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] for four minutes.

Mr. BURROWS. I wish to say one word further, if you will allow me. I am in favor of that measure which embodies substantial repeal. The bill reported by the committee makes the salary $5,500, and that is the exact equivalent of the old law. When you go beyond that you go beyond the wishes of the people.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I have but a few words to say on this matter. The word "clamor" has often been referred to in this debate. It is an old Saxon word, and not unknown to legislation. "Public clamor" is referred to as the foundation of the present proceeding. The words "common clamor," sir, may be found in the old English statute of præmunire; I think in that statute it is declared to be the basis of that legislation. It is the fair basis of legislation. Therefore, sir, if there is clamor on this business, I am, as a legislator, willing to be more or less influenced by it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, has a hard task before him in this Congress. He has either to raise money by loan or by taxation. He would fail in the future debate did he not speak in advance and demand our attention in aid of economic reform. I applaud the gentleman from Massachusetts for this caution. I believe this side of the House, irrespective of the views on this salary question, when it comes to economy in appropriations and the reduction of taxation will be found his most earnest supporters. But I do not wish to go into that matter at this time. There is time for that, or soon will be.

I will not now discuss the question whether this bill directly or indirectly is any substantial reduction of salaries. I think we were commanded by this "clamor" of the people to reinstate the salaries as they were; and having this command, men of all views voted for the bill of the gentlemen from Iowa and Ohio [Mr. KASSON and Mr. JEWETT] by an almost two-thirds majority. It was a creditable vote—179 to 63. We also, by a majority of 8, adopted the amendment offered in good faith by my distinguished friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] We have, sir, by this action of the House well spoken. I feel in that we did right. But I believe the fair expression of this House is not given in this bill. I therefore invite every man who hears me or heeds me to vote "no;" so that hereafter we may have a better bill. I speak consciously of the voice of my people and of the democracy of this country. [Laughter.] I know what I say. Gentlemen may smile. Let them go to their constituents and "smile" with them after another method.

Mr. Speaker, I do not find fault with gentlemen here as to their votes on this measure; but I do say to gentlemen who are so prompt at interruption, and who are sometimes so indecorous, that our State conventions—ay, the conventions of both parties, regardless of this House of Representatives—have given us instructions which are imperative, and if this kind of bill passes they will reinstruct us. [Laughter.]

It was said the other day by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CROSSLAND,] who made so much kindly amusement for the House at my expense, that I was somewhat complicated with New York politics. With special humor he did this in connection with the fact, referred to by him, that I had once introduced a bill here to change the name of the bark Industry to William M. Tweed. That was four years ago. Now, I know not who sent me that bill, or how I happened to introduce it. [Laughter.] We introduce hundreds of bills of that kind without special responsibility. But at that time no one dreamed that William M. Tweed would ever be in the penitentiary. He had been a member of Congress, to be sure; but nobody then dreamed he would have such a fate. I cannot tell who of us, four years from now, will be in the penitentiary. [Laughter.] I know who sent him there. The men who sent him there are the men who were maligned on this floor the other day; men who have purified the democratic party of New York, so that it is now the commanding power in that city and that State. They have instructed us on that question. They gave to us their platform last year at Syracuse; and I but obey the behests of the best men of my own party, as to whom my friend from Kentucky [Mr. CROSSLAND] would not take exception if he knew them; men who are high in the councils of our party; men like Mr. Tilden, and others who have helped to reform that party. I say to him that his fling at the democracy of that city and State was hardly characteristic of the good old chivalric Kentucky spirit. But I will pass that by as simply a personal thing.

I wish, in conclusion, to say to my friends on both sides of the House, irrespective of party differences, that if we would elevate the character of the national Legislature, we should be prompt to vindicate ourselves. Many have tried to do this by their votes who did not do it by their speeches. We will save the reproach thrown on us by a gentleman from Kentucky—I do not refer to Mr. CROSSLAND—when the intimation was given that the democracy was somewhat responsible for this measure. No party was responsible for it. It comes from the selfishness which belongs to our time. It comes from a spirit which is not up to the high tone of other days. I do wish the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] who spoke so eloquently the other day, instead of speaking for large salaries in this time of reduced wages to the workingmen and general distress—O, I wish that he could have come in like Cato, the censor, to reprove us for our inordinate greed and prompt us to a less selfish service. Long before you, sir, served here, when there were only five of us in this House who were here with the distinguished statesman from Georgia, when our expenditures were not considered extravagant even when not more than sixty or seventy millions a year, he could have spoken with emphasis the speech of men of that time, when every item in our appropriation bills was put to the knife, and the men who did not vote for economy were put to the torture.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. CROSSLAND. Before the gentleman from Iowa proceeds, I desire to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] a question. Did the gentleman object to my criticism of Tweed's rascality for the reason that other members of Congress from New York might follow Tweed into the penitentiary? [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. There is not a man in New York City, in the penitentiary or out of it, who believes that I am a dishonest man in this business or any other; and, as I said the other day, I am just as fresh from the people as anybody.

Mr. KASSON. I will ask the attention of the House for but a few moments; and in doing so I desire to leave the special elements of excitement, that are just now around us, and to recall the attention of my friends on the republican side of the House to the position in which they will be placed by voting in the affirmative or in the negative on this proposition. And I wish, at the same time, to say why it is that I feel compelled to vote as I shall do when the question is determined.

We came here but a few days ago, and the first act that was taken by this side of the House, in their capacity as Representatives, after providing for the organization of the House, was to pass resolutions which went forth from this Hall to the whole country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, for a repeal of the salary bill so far as it concerned members of Congress and other officers of the Government of the United States. The country hailed the declaration with satisfaction, and rejoiced at the fact that the old bugle-call of pure republicanism had been sounded in this Hall. Well, sir, we went to work as soon as possible. A bill was introduced, and finally there was secured from this side of the House the appointment of a committee to whom the bill should be referred, with leave to report at any time. The report was made by the committee, and every test vote by ayes and noes has shown a majority of this House in favor of carrying out that pledge in good faith, until this last question was sprung upon the House as a consequent upon a series of parliamentary tactics.

Now, I ask my republican friends upon this floor, can we, after the call has been issued to the country demanding their attention to our purpose to restore substantially the old law, after indorsing by an enormous majority the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana in the direction of fixing substantially the sum allowed by the old law—can we, instead of narrowing that in the interest of the people, expand it in the interest of ourselves? Mr. Speaker, we dare not, I venture to say, go before the country with such a lame and impotent conclusion of the call for attention which came from the republican members of this House. Entertaining these views, sir, the real repealers, to say the least, without speaking of others, voted against incumbering a clean bill. I recognized the feeling of this House as being against the amendment which I had the honor to offer, and felt it my duty to offer, as I know it was demanded by the people of Iowa and supported by every delegate from my State. I recognized that fact; but if that is to be the excuse for increasing our pay by $500, I say let it fail, and let the bill reported by the committee take its place, for that takes us back to the old standard. I dare not accept a bill increasing the pay, and must vote against it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I wish to answer a question which was addressed to me by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] who asked me why in my reckoning I had computed the franking privilege lost to members. My answer is that that was a distinctive measure, never mixed up with the salary bill. There will this winter, I venture to say, and I think members will bear me out in it, a proposition pass Congress that will allow public documents to be mailed for our constituencies. That measure will pass just the same if we get $6,000 as if we got $5,500; and I do not believe we ought to have it twice. I call for a vote.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to inquire of the Chair, if this motion should be lost, whether the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] would have an opportunity to move to recommit?

The SPEAKER. Not unless he move to reconsider. The question about to be taken is, "Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?" If the House should negative that motion the bill is dead. The vote, however, might be reconsidered, and if reconsidered it would be divested of the previous question, because the previous question would then have exhausted itself. But on the other hand—and this is the point which the gentleman from Connecticut asked the Chair to explain—if the House should pass the engrossment and third reading of the bill, then the previous question is exhausted, and it would be necessary to move the previous question on the passage of the bill; but pending that the gentleman desires to enter a motion to recommit, with instructions to the committee to report a new bill forthwith. That would be in order. If the House should refuse to second the previous question on the passage of the bill it would be in order to recommit with instructions to report forthwith. A new bill may be brought before the House in that way, and the Chair merely explains this as the process.

Mr. HALE, of New York. If the motion to recommit should be lost, would the question then recur on the passage of the bill as it is now before the House?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] if he will accept the bill reported under the instructions by the committee?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. No; I will not. I want to hit one target at a time. I will help the gentleman afterward about that.

Mr. DAWES. Why not help me now?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Because I prefer to do one thing at a time.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to call the attention of the Speaker to what I understand to be the position of the question. I would like to direct the attention of the Speaker to page 188 of the Manual, where he will find this passage:

> After commitment and a report thereof to the House, or at any time before its passage, a bill may be recommitted.

The main question has been now ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The main question now ordered will exhaust itself on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The previous question was called on the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is aware that the previous question exhausts itself on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, and that the previous question has to be called again on the passage of the bill. Members might naturally fall into error upon that point, because, generally, the test being made on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, it is rarely necessary to call the previous question on the passage; nevertheless, the previous question exhausts itself on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. But the motion to recommit is not in order until the previous question shall have exhausted itself?

The SPEAKER. Not before the previous question exhausts itself; after that it will be. The Chair will state that should the House now pass the bill to its engrossment and third reading, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] who moved the substitute will be entitled to the floor and to the direction of the bill on its passage.

Mr. DAWES. And suppose he moves the previous question upon us, and shuts us all out?

Mr. RANDALL. You have not been shut out; you have shut us out.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the previous question shall be demanded by the gentleman from Illinois, and shall not be sustained, will it not then be in order for the gentleman from Connecticut to make the motion to recommit with instructions, and will not that motion be open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will be open to amendment, providing the gentleman does not move the previous question on his instructions. The gentleman from Connecticut may move to recommit the bill, and may demand the previous question upon it, or he may yield for amendments. The question now is, Will the House order that the bill, as amended by the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois, be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was put on ordering the yeas and nays, and only 28 members voted in favor thereof.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask for tellers on the yeas and nays. I am not certain that the House understands the question.

The SPEAKER. This is the real test vote on the bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I understand this to be the test vote.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL, and Mr. HALE of Maine, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 43, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 158, nays 104, not voting 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Buffinton, Burchard, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Bland, Freeman Clarke, Dobbins, Hereford, Hersey, Hooper, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lewis, Loughridge, McKee, Mitchell, Morey, Purman, Rapier, James C. Robinson, Sheats, William A. Smith, Stephens, St. John, and Walls—23.

So the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. HEREFORD said: On this question I am paired with Mr. MOREY, of Louisiana. If he were here he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

The bill, as amended, was then engrossed and read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This is the point at which, under the rule, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] takes the control of the management of this bill.

Mr. HURLBUT. I am entitled to some time on this bill. I propose to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] for fifteen minutes, reserving to myself five minutes, at the close of which I will call the previous question on the passage of this bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I call the House to witness that I have taken no part in this debate so far. I felt it due as well to the House, and especially to the republican side of it, as to the country, and to the republican party in the country, that I should take no leading part in endeavoring to sustain the action of the Forty-second Congress in reference to salaries, lest it might be said that I was endeavoring to sustain that legislation in disobedience to the supposed expressed will of the people. I have proceeded in any vote or motion I have given or made upon one of two hypotheses: either that the House bill, as passed by the Forty-second Congress, was right and should be sustained, or that the people demanded its unconditional repeal, and specially because of the retroactive clause in it.

Upon this matter, also, I was instructed by the resolutions of the convention of my State, before which I put my name for a high office, in regard to the increase of the salaries of the President, judges, and Cabinet officers, by which resolutions such increase was decided to have seemed necessary, although it is most true that my action in regard to establishing these salaries was used as a means of demagogy, in order to defeat me, by the very same men who supported and elected, against the republican nominee, my late colleague, General Banks, who stood by me and aided with eloquence and vote every movement I made to increase salaries, and had received and retained retroactive pay in the several Congresses, thus demonstrating their own insincerity and unfairness.

Clearly there are but two logical results to be attained in this matter. One that the increase of the salaries ought to be sustained because necessary and right, or that the whole legislation ought to be repealed because it is decided by the people to be wrong, and we must obey their voice by a total repeal. I look upon the present measure as a compromise between these, as most all measures of a republican government of necessity must be, and therefore I support it as nearest the right that can be had.

While the Forty-second Congress had acted in passing that clause which has been denounced as a "grab," and a "steal," and a "robbery," in exact conformity with the precedents from the beginning of the Government, yet I have considered that in so doing we were acting but as representatives of the people; and although we, as such representatives, uninstructed except by the precedents, might well act with entire good faith and propriety in conformity therewith, yet if the people, our constituents, really desired a change to be made in the manner in which we as legislators should fix our own compensation under the Constitution, it would be our bounden duty to bow to their will, however much it might be against our own judgment. And if the matter had been fully and fairly presented to the people; if the press had published both sides of the question, so that it should have been fairly discussed and the people instructed, I, for one, would have felt myself bound by the popular will, and yielded my own judgment to its behest; and in giving my votes, I have endeavored, if the repeal of the law was to take place at all, that it should be so repealed as to bring back into the Treasury all the money within the reach of the Treasury which had been received as retroactive compensation by any person. Such was the scope of the amendment which I offered, and which has been adopted by the House as a part of the bill for which the present measure has been substituted.

I have listened with wonder not unmixed with disgust and admiration [laughter] to a portion of the debate which has been had here upon this subject. With one or two exceptions, no man has undertaken to discuss the merits of the bill. The country has not been told what all know to be true, that a man cannot live in this city and support his wife and family as he ought to do upon $5,000 a year. I have not heard any man, rising in his place, say that he could keep house only as a decent man should upon less than that sum which has been insisted upon only ought to be given to members of Congress for their compensation.

But it is said that the people demand this repeal, because of the condition of the finances and the commercial distress of the country. But what was the condition of those finances when this bill was passed last March? The country was never more prosperous. We were then paying our public debt at the rate of three or four millions a month to redeem obligations which had not become due; in my opinion, a most injudicious policy, from which we are now called upon to impose additional taxes and burdens to meet our necessary expenditures.

Had the financial panic of the country anything to do with the demand for repeal? If made at all, was it not long before the financial panic began? Did it not arise immediately after the close of the session, and continue to grow stronger and louder as weak members of the Forty-second Congress yielded to the clamor and paid back their own justly earned and legally received money into the Treasury? Therefore should the panic have anything to do either with the question of the repeal or the question of the amount? But is it true that the just judgment of the people, after full discussion, has instructed us to change the rate of future compensation even? Has there been any well-considered action of the people, after any discussion whatever, upon the question of what would be a fair and just compensation for members of Congress in the future?

It has been declared here that the people demand this repeal, and the voice of the press is cited as cogent evidence of the fact. I admit that a howl was begun here and sent through the land by a venal and corrupt press against us because we would not give free passage through the mails to all the dirty sheets that their wicked conductors might print; so vile that the Forty-second Congress passed a law to punish the sending of these obscene publications through the post-office to save the youth of the land from pollution. Having passed that wise and salutary law, that Congress has been assaulted through these mud-machines, worked with forty jackass-power, to howl down every member who stood up in the image of his Maker and remained firm to his convictions of duty. [Applause.] Stories most libelous and vile have been willfully invented and maliciously circulated in order to blacken the character of those who voted for the salary increase of last session; and I have a member in my eye who kept such machine going daily, (or rather the machine kept him going,) wherein, in conjunction with my fellow-members of that Congress, I was decried continually as a back-salary grabber, robber, and back-pay stealer, with a shamelessness never equaled; for the conductor of that press had in his pocket and keeps there now—unless expended to keep his trade going—a greater percentage of "back pay" and salary grab than any other member of the Forty-second Congress.

We have read a great deal about back pay in the newspapers. Mr. Speaker, let me tell you what I call "back pay." When a newspaper editor, who has not been elected, and only the stroke of God interfering with the actions of men could give him a chance of election, and that man takes more than a thousand dollars—say thirteen hundred and forty-seven dollars and fourteen cents—pay, which covered the salary between the time his predecessor died and the date he took his own seat, and covered time before the people ever thought of electing him to Congress—that is what I call "back pay;" and if I was using hard words, or was a newspaper writer, I should characterize as "salary grab," "salary swindle," and "salary steal;" specially so if the same newspaper editor returned to the Treasury of other back pay which he took—$109.07 only—and claimed loudly in his organ and elsewhere that he had given back to the Treasury all his back pay, and was therefore more honest and virtuous than mankind in general.

Now whether one calls himself a "dew-drop" or an "ink-drop" who shall take such back pay, whether a lawyer here takes $3,705 for time before he is elected, or an editor $1,347.14 for a like time, it is all the same—it is true, genuine back pay, unearned, undue, unjust, and unclaimable. That is a kind of "back pay" I never did have. I never took any pay, back or forward, for services I knew I had not rendered, or that I had not tried to earn and had had an opportunity to earn, and when I do, any newspaper editor may call me a salary-grabber and back-pay grabber.

We have been insulted, in obedience to the howls of the press, by members on this floor, by being told that our pay received from the 4th of March last is "front pay," and that we had not earned it, and that we should receive $7,500 for a few months' service only. Is that true? Pardon me, gentlemen; have you not had duties to perform from the 4th of March last? Were you not daily called upon to take care of some constituent, to see after his interest in some way, to represent business here at the seat of Government in some form? Were you not called upon to do something in connection with the affairs of your constituents, to give your nomination and approval of officers in your district? Were not your doors besieged by your constituents, by the lame, the maim, the soldier or the soldier's widow, who asked you to look after his or her pension? Did you do nothing after the 4th of March last? If not, then you acted very differently, allow me to say, from what I, as a Representative faithful to the interests of his constituents, have been compelled to do.

I have even more work of this kind to do in vacation than I have in session time. I have often found more occupation at home than here; because my constituents reach me there without the expense of a long journey, and put before me their needs and wishes and claims. I know that I have more leisure here than I have at home, outside of my time in this House. And yet we, the Congress of the United States, are daily insulted by being told in most offensive words that we have taken pay that we have never earned. Sir, if we have severally done our duty, we earned all we got from the beginning, and the pay is fixed as the compensation of the faithful, and not the careless Representative. Notwithstanding this, a proposition was brought in here to make us refund the pay that we have already received under the act of Congress of the last session. That was supported here by gentlemen who said they yielded to the demands of the people, when there was not a man who voted for it who did not feel he was doing a wrong to his judgment and his conscience, that he was being driven to part with his just rights and lawful dues, by a pressure manufactured by some time-serving office-seeker and demagogue at home, who would otherwise seek to take advantage of him and stab him in the back.

That is the compelling power driving men to vote as we did. All that, our judgment taught us, was proper and just. Now, when I saw that measure urged and voted for by men who had more back pay in their pockets than I had, I determined to make them drink to the dregs the cup they presented to others; and therefore I proposed to make the same principle of refund apply to all Congresses, and to reach men who had in their pockets, one $11,000, another $7,000, another $8,000, another $4,000, and others who had money received for salary covering time before their services began or the people had elected them, and who got here simply upon this cry raised by them on the stump in their districts that they were more virtuous than others and therefore must be sent here to repeal the increase of salary. When I saw that I voted in order that I might carry out the other proposition, which was that we should all be served alike. Therefore I voted for the proposition to take the pay from my pocket for the Forty-second Congress; and I was beaten by the votes of men who had the pay of two or three Congresses in their pockets and voted to keep it there. [Laughter.] And then one of these same gentlemen rose in his place and told how much better a conscience he had than I had upon this question, [laughter,] and how he would bide his time.

The truth about this matter shall not be concealed or hidden under a bushel. Let me not be misunderstood. The law gave this money to these gentlemen, and I do not blame them for taking it and keeping it; but when they have it in their pockets I do not want them to set themselves up as my superiors in virtue and integrity, and amuse themselves by writing in their manuscripts the old line of the copy-book, "Be virtuous and you will be happy." [Laughter.]

I have heard another argument put forward as a reason for fixing our compensation at the lowest possible figure—that in view of the present financial distress we should bring down our pay to the lowest possible amount. Why, sir, is there a man in this House who does not know that we are fixing the compensation of members of Congress for all time—at least during this generation? In view of the clamor that has been raised no man will again have what my "dew-drop" friend calls my "audacity" to rise hereafter and ask any Congress to increase its own pay retroactively; and our fathers determined by their votes upon the first amendments to the Constitution that no man would ever vote to increase anybody's pay forward unless his pay was brought up to the same standard. No Congress, no Legislature, ever did or ever will vote to give their successors increased pay unless they themselves share in it; because, in addition to the pecuniary motive which is operative, more or less, upon all who are human, it would be understood that by such a discrimination a Congress brands its members as inferiors by declaring that their own services are worth less than those of their successors. Therefore I say there is not a man in this House who does not know that we are this day and this hour fixing the congressional compensation for all time, so far as this generation is concerned.

Therefore, in a just and proper determination of this compensation, whatever may be the financial condition of the country to-day we are to look to the position of our country as it will be in the future—even to that time, soon coming, when we shall have taken in Mexico, Cuba, and the adjacent isles of the sea. We should remember that it is the destiny of the American Republic to send its civilizing, enlightening, and christianizing influences over this northern continent. Therefore I say that in settling this question we should not look at the ephemeral check of the moment to our great progress. We should fix what we believe to be honest, fair, and just compensation. In voting for the act of last March I believed our services to be worth to the country $7,500. I believe it now. I have never wavered in that belief. I have never entertained the idea of yielding to the mere factitious and senseless clamor. I have learned my duty as a Representative from the words of the eloquent Burke, the great philosophical statesman of England, who said: "The representative owes to his constituents not only his industry but his judgment; and he betrays instead of serving them if he sacrifices either to their opinions."

If my constituents knew the facts as well as I do I would agree that their judgment would conclude my action. They judge rightly according to the light they have and act honestly upon the subject as they understand it; but they have seen the subject in the pestiferous twilight of newspaper misrepresentation without the subject ever having been discussed before them.

Better informed than they, I based my opinion in reference to this subject upon six years of actual service here. I thought the country would believe that it made no difference to me whether I received $7,500 or $5,000 a year, and that I therefore acted impartially. Neither sum supports me here, although I live economically, in a style no other or different in its appointments than I have lived at home for twenty years. I therefore spoke and voted in behalf of those members of Congress poor but able—the sons, perhaps, of mechanics and farmers, who have worked their way through college while their fathers may have hammered on the anvil to give them the means for studying their professions—men who by industry, energy, and conscientious effort worked themselves up to positions of influence and usefulness in the confidence of their fellow-citizens who have sent them here to represent them—the peers of the proudest on this floor, but because of want of private fortune must either live meanly and feel meanly because living in a different way from their associates, or must have sufficient pay to provide themselves a decent support, as others in like conditions live. A "decent support," sir? That was not the idea of the Constitution when our fathers provided for our pay. It does not say anything about "support." It provides for a "compensation" fixed by law—a compensation for sacrificing the gains of private occupations and the comforts and social influences of home—a compensation for services rendered—a compensation as fair and just as the same class of services commands in the market outside of Congress.

Let me give you other evidence that this is the view entertained by the fathers of the Republic. When they fixed George Washington's salary at $25,000, which was practically four times as much as it is now, in comparison, the head carpenter who repaired his house received but 50 cents a day, while the head carpenter who is now repairing my house thinks he is not quite fairly treated while receiving $6 a day. Under those circumstances what was fixed as the pay of members of the Cabinet? It was fixed at $3,000 only. Why? Because in that day the largest sum received as salary by any banker, by any manager of business affairs in the United States, was less than $3,000. They gave Cabinet officers a higher salary than was received by any man at the head of any business enterprise. On this point, which I have well examined, I challenge contradiction. The intention was to put the Cabinet officers at a high level; so their income was put quite as high as that of any business man. Great wealth then differed from great wealth now as much as different business salaries then and now. In the year 1799 the largest fortunes in this country were those of George Washington and a gentleman of my district—one the great planter with a fortune of $650,000, the other the great merchant with a fortune of $900,000. They both died in that year. Now there are men in this country who reckon their fortunes by three hundred millions and four hundred millions. There are more men to-day in this country worth $1,000,000 than there were worth $20,000 at the time George Washington's salary was fixed at $25,000 in addition to horses, plate, furniture, fixtures, and almost everything else necessary for his support.

Many MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. HURLBUT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts for ten minutes longer.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I thank the gentleman and the House for their indulgence. Before the end of that time I hope to be out of my friend's way.

There is one thing I wish to say to my fellow-members, especially those who are here for the first time. During the seven years, more or less, that I have been here, I have found that the great fault in Congress is the self-abnegation of its members. Let but a man point his finger at a member of Congress, and we are apt to shrink away from him, and act toward him as if he must have done some wrong, without standing by him as an honest gentleman until his guilt is proven. Let a single thing be said against the acts of any member of Congress, and forthwith some demagogue—for occasionally demagogues get in here, as of Christ's twelve apostles one of them had a devil, [laughter]—some demagogue, I say, to show that he is not guilty of the same thing, when most probably his conscience accuses him, brings in a bill restraining the Congressman from doing the thing charged. This has gone on for a series of years, until a Congressman is shut out from the pursuit of almost all kinds of business. We cannot have any interest in a contract that has any relation with the Government. We cannot practice as attorneys in the courts in which the largest interests of the United States are involved. The Supreme Court is about the only one left to us. We cannot go home and practice in our State courts, or do any other business, without neglecting our public duties.

The trouble is that we do not stand together, but let the men up there, [pointing to the reporters' gallery,] who live by our bounty, sit there by our indulgence to write diatribes against us and blacken us all over until the whole world is made to believe that members of Congress are worse than other men, when, in fact, we are the chosen men of the nation, and better, as a class, than men in any other single profession—clergymen, lawyers, or doctors; for whenever a clergyman gets into Congress, we have seen he is not especially conspicuous for his virtue any more than his fellows. [Laughter.] I say that we ought to stand here and say Congress is not to be maligned; and if we are maligned, let us stand together and say that without proof the character of no man, simply because he is a member of Congress, shall be attacked, and the attack hounded on by his fellows from petty envy, jealousy, or rivalry.

Let me say here—and I speak not now of the motives of men; far be that from me; I speak of the effect of their acts—I aver here, with the bright light shining upon me and in the face of the country, that one-half of all this outcry against this salary increase came because some men—generally who could afford it pecuniarily—after they had felt the pulse of their constituents ostentatiously dropped their additional pay back into the Treasury, thus causing themselves to be advertised as paragons of virtue and economy. Am I not right? If we had all stood like men and taken what the law gave us, and spent it as we ought to have done; if none of us had undertaken to set up a supreme virtue in ourselves in giving back the money, the thing would have passed by as it did in 1866, when Congress voted itself an increase of 66 per cent. upon its previous salary in addition to all mileages and allowances, while the Forty-second Congress only voted itself 50 per cent. increase and cut off all mileage and other perquisites, which had never been done before. Yet we are stigmatized as reckless back-pay grabbers and back-salary stealers.

Mr. DAWES. In 1866 Congress reduced the mileage one-half.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My colleague corrects me. The mileage had been forty cents a mile, and they reduced it to twenty cents. Virtuous Congress! Economical people! [Laughter.] But at the same time they increased their pay 66 per cent., and took all their perquisites, mileage, newspapers, stationery, printing privilege, and all, in addition, and the people said not a word, although our national debt was seven hundred millions more then than now. What, then, is the cause of this different treatment of the two Congresses in regard to these like matters? The Thirty-ninth Congress left the newspapers with their perquisites of free postage; the Forty-second Congress took free postage from the press and themselves at the same time.

Mr. PENDLETON. Did not that Congress take the mileage at forty cents per mile for themselves while reducing it one-half as to subsequent Congresses?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I believe so; but the gentleman must settle that with my colleague, [Mr. DAWES.] I was not a member of that Congress, and he was. He will tell you all about it.

One remark further. We are here now to fix a salary—for whom? For members of Congress alone; that is the present bill. Are not the services of members of Congress worth something? Are they not worth as much as those of the heads of Departments? Do we not work as many hours as they? Do we not do more business? Coming here for only a part of each year, is not the expense greater, because those of us having houses at home have to keep them up in addition to paying for a house here? Yet gentlemen come here and say, "O, you must keep up the salaries of the heads of Departments; their services are very valuable." That may be, and is, true. Yet members of Congress are to be considered as the only ones whose services are to be given for nothing, and they to pay their own expenses—why? Simply because the power to regulate our pay has been placed in our own hands by the Constitution; for no other reason under heaven. We are to abuse and belittle our services and ourselves because we have had by the wisdom of the fathers placed in our hands the power to magnify and exalt our offices, but which we in fact have always subordinated in the matter of salaries to other like high officers of the Government.

I do not mean to say, and do not believe, the salaries of the members of the Cabinet are too high. One member of the Cabinet spends $30,000 a year to maintain his proper station, while others spend clear up to their income; and one of the ablest I know left the Cabinet because the salary was not sufficient to enable him to maintain that state, without sacrificing his private fortune, which his associates maintained around him. But this matter of holding office with the executive officers is one of choice; but the Representative of the people comes here in behalf of the people, and, as their choice, ought to be properly compensated at least to the amount of a generous maintenance.

Let me say our services are as valuable as the services of any body of men in the world. And I want the poor men to be able to come into Congress. Rich men will buy themselves here. It is the only corruption in this regard we have ever heard of. Rich men do not come here for the salary. I admit that in the English Parliament no man gets any salary, and therefore nobody but rich men ever get into Parliament. And what has been the effect of legislation of rich men? England, with all the wealth of the world poured into her lap, with commerce whitening every sea, with colonies broader than empires, with manufactories standing over coal-beds which furnish unlimited power to her machinery, with energy indomitable and labor without stint, how does she stand to-day under the legislation of rich men? One out of twelve of every one of her population is either in the poor-house, insane hospital, or the prison every year. You could not draw an impartial jury in England out of the inhabitants without getting on it either a pauper, an insane person, or a criminal. Do we want this country to try the experiment of legislation of rich men only?

There are those of us who have either inherited wealth, or have by hard labor before we came here earned or acquired it. Some of us can by professional service and labors eke out our incomes; others can afford to live well from their own fortunes or incomes, and it makes no special difference with them. But to you, men of the West—where we of the East invest our money and get much of your profits as fast as you get it yourselves—men of the South coming up from districts impoverished by the war—you have no such means, have the most interest in this question, and I for one, although I foresaw the storm, stood up for the rights of poor men to be in the halls of legislation on a social equality, as peers in right and power. If you fix your salaries at $6,000 for this year, I shall take it as an intimation to me to equalize my salary as a member of the Forty-second Congress to that sum; but I expressly advise everybody else not to do it. I do not do it from any claim to superior virtue. I simply do it to answer the calumnies of some groveling demagogues in my own State. [Laughter.] And for another reason, that I feel I can afford to do it. Those are the two sufficient personal reasons; and I hope all who are not troubled with demagogues in their own districts, and who cannot afford it, will not pay it back.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, let us pass this compromise bill, end this profitless and in some cases acrimonious debate, and go on with the business of the country. One gentleman told us that he wanted this substitute carried in order that he might put in an amendment to cut it down $500. I can tell him how he can help the Treasury some—let him give back the $1,347 genuine back salary he took between the time his predecessor died and he was elected and took his seat, and he will help the Treasury so much, and then his conscience will be no longer troubled. [Laughter.] And my friend whom death elected from New York, after the people had rejected him, [laughter,] because nothing else could but death, [renewed laughter,] comes here and tells us we are not fresh from the people, and do not know their wishes. We are not fresh from defeat by the people, [laughter,] and we did not have to move out of our State to get elected, and then wait until a man died to get a chance. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I have done; I have said my say. I am going to the country again. I propose to meet my constituents and say to them, as I have always said, that my action last March was done after careful examination. It approved itself to my judgment. I have seen no valid reasons against it, and I stand by, defend, uphold, justify, and sustain it against all comers. If I go down I shall not be the first man who has gone down by the assaults of the unreasoning mob in acting without reflection in a just cause. But let none of those who seek my fall lay the flattering unction to their soul that I shall not rise again. [Applause.] I shall return to plague the inventors of the machinery which overthrows me. [Laughter.]

I have now only the pleasant duty to thank the House for the kind attention with which it has listened to me, and I return my time, if any I have left, to the hand which gave it to me. [Applause.]

Mr. HURLBUT. I yield five minutes of my time to my colleague, [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to explain my vote on the passage of this bill. I believe the act of March 3, 1873, so far as the same increases salaries, should be repealed, and that, by law to be enacted, members of the Forty-third Congress, for two years' service, should receive the same compensation they would have received had their salaries not been increased. All my efforts and votes on the floor of this House have been given to accomplish that end. I have seen the bill which I favored, known as Mr. KASSON'S substitute, loaded with amendments for the purpose of slaughtering the same, and then set aside by the substitution of the bill of my colleague from Illinois; and now, under the rules and usages of this House, I am placed in a position that I am powerless to do anything at this time except to vote for or against this bill fixing the pay of members at $6,000—a reduction at the rate of $1,500 per annum. I am in favor of that reduction and more too; and as that is all I can get now I vote for it, for if I vote the other way it leaves the salary at $7,500 per annum. But I wish to state that I stand ready, and will do what I can from now until the close of the Forty-third Congress, to reduce the salaries of members, and all others that can be reduced under the Constitution, to what they were prior to the increase of the same on the 3d of March last.

Mr. HURLBUT. I now call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Will the Chair please explain the effect of seconding the previous question at this stage?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is now seconded, it operates on the passage of the bill, and brings the House to vote on that. The gentleman from Connecticut has intimated his desire to submit a motion to recommit the bill, with instructions to the committee to report a new bill forthwith. He can only have that motion brought before the House by a refusal to second the demand for the previous question on the passage of the bill. The vote will now be had upon that. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] will act as tellers.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I would like to hear the bill reported again.

Several MEMBERS. O, no.

The SPEAKER. It is very brief, and it is in order to ask for the reading of the bill at every fresh stage. After the tellers take their places the bill will be read.

The tellers having taken their places, the bill was again read.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 143, noes not counted.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been seconded, and on the main question the gentleman from Connecticut calls for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. The negative vote on seconding the demand for the previous question has not been reported. Several gentlemen passed between the tellers on the negative side.

The SPEAKER. The ayes reported were a majority of the whole House, and the Chair understood the gentleman from Connecticut, who represents the minority side, to call for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. All I want is a chance to offer my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will further state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that it has always been the habit of the House, when a majority vote in the affirmative on seconding the demand for the previous question, not to detain the tellers any further. If the majority of the entire House vote to second the demand for the previous question it cannot be defeated.

Mr. RANDALL. We ought to know the relative strength on each side.

The SPEAKER. If all the rest were counted on the other side, still the previous question would have been seconded. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays on the main question.

The question being taken, there were ayes 50.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The House of course is aware that the real test vote is on ordering the main question. The House will understand that if the main question is not ordered to be put, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That being the understanding, I will vote "no."

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair has stated that this is a test vote. I desire to know whether if a member wishes to close the debate and bring the House to a vote he cannot vote for ordering the main question, and then subsequently vote against the bill?

The SPEAKER. That would be perfectly consistent.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire that the House should understand that, because the Chair stated that this was to be regarded as a test vote.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to make another parliamentary inquiry. If the House should refuse to order the main question, and the gentleman from Connecticut is recognized to offer his amendment, then, if I deisre to amend his amendment further, or if any other gentleman desired to offer an amendment, would not the door be open for such amendments?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; provided the gentleman from Connecticut does not demand and secure the previous question on his motion.

Mr. CESSNA. If in that event the House should vote down the demand of the gentleman from Connecticut for the previous question, then, as I understand it, I would be permitted, if recognized by the Chair, to offer an amendment making further legislation.

The SPEAKER. Of course.

The question was on ordering the main question on the passage of the bill as amended.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 131, nays 130, not voting 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Atkins, Averill, Barrere, Barry, Bell, Biery, Bradley, Bright, Buffinton, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Woodford, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—130.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Begole, Bland, Hereford, Hersey, Hooper, Kellogg, Kendall, Lamison, Lewis, Alexander S. McDill, Mitchell, Morey, Phelps, Purman, Rapier, James C. Robinson, Sawyer, Sheats, William A. Smith, Stephens, St. John, Walls, and Wheeler—24.

So the main question was ordered.

During the roll-call,

Mr. HEREFORD said: I am paired upon this question with the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. MOREY.] If he were present he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. SPEER. I move that the House do now adjourn; it is nearly nine o'clock.

The question was put; and the House refused to adjourn.

The question was then taken on Mr. BUTLER's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 119, noes 57.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. POTTER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The question was put on ordering the yeas and nays, and only 23 members voted therefor.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 38, noes 178.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, one-fifth not voting therefor.

The question was put upon the passage of the bill, and on a division there were—ayes 122, noes 74.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HURLBUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HURLBUT moved to amend the title of the bill so that it should read "An act to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates."

The motion was agreed to.

EXTRAORDINARY EXPENSES OF THE NAVY.

Mr. GARFIELD. The bill (H. R. No. 481) making appropriations for extraordinary expenses of the naval service has been returned from the Senate with amendments. I ask that it be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

METROPOLITAN POLICE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. McKEE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 24) relative to the Metropolitan Police of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. SPEER, (at nine o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CLARK, of Missouri: The petition of H. C. Beall and others, asking that the postal code be so amended that all mail matter, whether letters or newspapers, may be prepaid at the office of mailing.

By Mr. COTTON: The petition of George Yount, late second lieutenant Company I, Third Regiment Missouri Infantry, for relief.

By Mr. FRYE: The petition of Mary A. Chute, of Maine, for a pension.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of C. B. Poor, of Ohio, asking for such a change in the bounty law as to give a bounty to those who, on account of sickness, were unable to serve two full years in the Army.

By Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois: The petition of David Mearl, praying for a pension.

By Mr. E. R. HOAR: The petition of Simeon F. Flint and others, for a constitutional amendment to prevent the increase of salaries to take effect at any time during the Congress which passes the same.

By Mr. LUTTRELL: The petition of Rev. T. L. Moody and others, of Sacramento, California, for relief of the Southern Methodist publishing house.

By Mr. MORRISON: The petition of John Scott, James Scott, and John Belsha, praying for relief.

Also, the petition of Victor Mylon, praying compensation as first and second lieutenant Sixty-eighth New York Volunteers.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of the posts of the Grand Army of the Republic of the city of Philadelphia, asking a donation of condemned cannon and cannon-balls for the purpose of inclosing cemetery lots.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of Edward McCormick, for a pension.

Also, a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, for the increase of pensions to those soldiers who have lost both eyes or both arms or legs, or two limbs.

By Mr. PIERCE: A petition of owners, merchants, and masters of American vessels, residents of Massachusetts, for the repeal of the act appointing shipping commissioners approved June 7, 1872.

Also, a petition of mariners in the port of New York, for the repeal of the act appointing shipping commissioners approved June 7, 1872.

By Mr. PLATT, of Virginia: The memorial of George H. Hickman, formerly adjutant Ninety-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteers, praying for certain relief.

By Mr. SENER: Memorial of Matilda Barnett and others, heirs of Lieutenant James Barnett, of the Second (or Sixth) Regiment in Continental Establishment, revolutionary war.

By Mr. WALLACE: A petition praying that the papers in the case of Henry Weldon, now on file in the office of the Clerk of the House, be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. STONE: Two petitions of Cogswell & Co., for relief from taxes erroneously assessed and collected.

POST-ROUTE BILLS.

By Mr. BUCKNER: A bill to establish a post-route from Columbia to Fulton, Missouri, by way of Stephens's store and Millerburgh.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: A bill to establish a post-route in Knox County, Tennessee.

Also, a bill to establish a post-route in Tennessee.

Also, a bill to establish a post-route in Monroe County, Tennessee.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 18, 1873.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 793) to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented two petitions of citizens of Greenville, Michigan, praying that the postal code be so amended that all mail matter be prepaid at the office of mailing, and that a more equitable system of fixing postmasters' salaries be devised; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. INGALLS presented a memorial of citizens of Kansas, praying that all the soldiers of the late war may be entitled to a pension and one hundred and sixty acres of land, irrespective of their time of service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of Mrs. Jane MacMurray, widow of Ezekiel MacMurray, a soldier of the war of 1812, praying that her pension may be made to date from the death of her husband; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented a memorial of the officers of the National Association for the Care of Destitute Colored Women and Children, praying further aid from Congress to the extent of $5,000; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. OGLESBY presented a petition of the Chicago Society of Surgeons and Physicians, praying for the passage of a bill to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I present the memorial of the American Indian Aid Association remonstrating against the organization of the territorial government of Oklahoma over the Indian Territory. This remonstrance is signed by Tappen Townsend, chairman, and W. C. Gould, secretary, in behalf of the association. The protest is based on the ground that the action proposed would be a violation of our treaties which have set apart that Territory exclusively for the Indians, and would open the door also for the admission of unprincipled white men, and be a great burden of taxation to the Indians, and impose upon them laws which they, being uneducated, would be unable to comprehend. Upon these and other reasons the remonstrance is based. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I would suggest that the bill to which that memorial refers has been referred to the Committee on Territories, and perhaps the remonstrance had better take the same course.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The bill to which that memorial refers is before the Committee on Territories. It seems to me it should be withdrawn from that committee, or they should be discharged from the consideration of the bill and it should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator submit that motion?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Committee on Territories be discharged from the further consideration of the bill indicated by him, being Senate bill No. 27, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs with this memorial.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the petition of Margaret Meade, administratrix of the estate of Richard W. Meade, in which she sets forth certain large obligations on the part of the King of Spain to her father, which were assumed by the United States at the time of the cession of Florida, and which she represents are still good against the United States. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, in relation to the tax levied on cotton by the United States Government in the years 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING presented the memorial of citizens of New York, remonstrating against the proposed repeal of the bankrupt law and asking that it be amended; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the memorial of E. S. Jaffray & Co.; Arnold, Constable & Co.; S. B. Chittenden & Co.; and other leading business men of the city of New York, asking that the bankrupt law be not repealed but amended; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of T. P. Pendleton, of Virginia, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of W. N. Berkely be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of C. E. Rogers be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to publishing maps of surveys of the Mississippi River be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Printing.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of J. R. D. Morrison be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Richard J. Murray, of Lowndes County, Mississippi, praying for an increase of his pension, reported adversely thereon, and submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. DENNIS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 171) for the benefit of the legatees of Asbury Dickins, deceased, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

NAME OF A YACHT.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce have directed me to report a bill to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Fearless; and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put it on its passage now.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 216) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Fearless was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It grants authority to the owner of the pleasure-yacht Fearless, of the port of Detroit, Michigan, to change the name of the yacht to that of Lily, by which name the vessel shall be known and registered.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSUL-GENERAL IN EGYPT.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce have directed me to report back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 16) providing for a change in the name and title of the agent and consul-general of the United States at Alexandria favorably, and to ask that it be changed from a joint resolution to a bill; and as it is the same as the bill reported from that committee a week ago, and is deemed by the State Department important, I ask for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the name and title of the agent and consul-general of the United States at Alexandria shall hereafter be "agent and consul-general of the United States at Cairo."

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand that the residence of the consul-general is changed?

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the sole object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Michigan that, this being a House joint resolution, if it should be changed in the Senate it would interfere with their method of keeping records in the House. It will, therefore, be submitted to the Senate as a joint resolution with the same effect.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to have that bill reported again and to inquire the effect of it.

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. CHANDLER. It removes our consul-general from Alexandria to the capital of the country, which is Cairo. That is the sole effect and object of the joint resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. It is all right.

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the bill (S. No. 151) in relation to the consul-general of the United States at Alexandria, Egypt, which is identical, be indefinitely postponed, for the purpose of taking it off the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF BIENNIAL REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 215) in relation to the printing of the Biennial Register, commonly called the Blue Book, have instructed me to report it back without amendment; and as that book is now going into type the bill should be acted upon immediately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let it be read, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill. In lieu of the number of copies of the Biennial Register now authorized by law to be printed, it proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be printed fifteen hundred copies of that work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator. Heretofore it has been contemplated—I think the Senator himself at some time recommended—the discontinuance of the printing of that book.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have done so several times, but the Senate has uniformly voted me down. It is the judgment of the Senate that the book should be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to inquire of the Senator if it is not a good time now to do that thing—to discontinue the printing of this work?

Mr. ANTHONY. The book has been prepared and is in the hands of the Printer. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] was particularly anxious that this work should be printed, and thought it was a very useful document; and, contrary to his usual economy, he defeated me when I endeavored to have the printing of it discontinued. I think it was the very general opinion of the Senate, upon debate, that the book should be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Biennial Register is the most useful and convenient book published for our information, as it enables us to know who the officers of the Government are. It is the only book that I know of that contains the information we have to refer to daily, giving the names of the officers of the Government and their post-office address. It is a small matter. I believe there are only five hundred printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. Seven hundred and fifty; but more have been printed latterly, because the number of the members of the House of Representatives has increased, and is now increased still more; and the number of officers to whom it is necessary for the purpose of reference has increased considerably.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does not cost as much as a day's printing of the bills that are laid upon our table.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is a mere compilation of information contained in other documents.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think most of the information is contained in other documents, and generally it is more recent, more fresh, in other documents than in the Biennial Register.

This subject was fully debated in the Senate some time ago when we made some reforms in the public printing, and the expression throughout the Senate was so general—I think there were but eight or ten with me—that I made no further effort about it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I did not rise to object to the bill, but simply to make an inquiry. It is obvious enough that when the public printing of this country has reached the cost of $3,000,000 there ought to be some reduction or some limit somewhere.

Mr. ANTHONY. The public printing of the Government is not nearly as much as it used to be. When we talk about the public printing, we must recollect that now it includes not only what used to be included under that head, but also covers the printing for all the Departments, including the Internal Revenue Department, which is very large, though not so large as it was at one time; and, also, the binding and blank-books for the custom-houses. The amount of service which the Government Printing Office now renders is more than double what the public printing was at a former time. There has been great economy in that branch of the public service.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will ask the Senator whether he does not know as a fact, or whether it is or not a fact, that the printing of the Departments, and the printing of many of the Bureaus, is very much greater than it ever was before in the practice of the Government?

Mr. ANTHONY. The printing of the Departments is strictly fixed by law. Each Department makes an estimate of the amount of printing that it requires, and that estimate goes before the committee of which my friend is chairman, and that amount of printing is done for the Department at the discretion of its head. So much is appropriated to the State Department, and the Secretary of State disburses it or directs how the printing shall be done; and so of the other Departments.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is an explanation; but still does not the fact remain, that in these several Departments the printing has been very largely increased, both in quality and extent?

Mr. ANTHONY. Everything in the Government has been largely increased, and I do think that many of the Departments order a quality of work which is in most wretched taste and very expensive.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is what I refer to.

Mr. ANTHONY. The idea of binding a congressional document as you would a copy of Shakespeare or Byron, with turkey-morocco and blind-tooling, is just as wretched taste as it would be for a man to come up here with white kid gloves on.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is that matter of law or matter of discretion in the Departments?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is a matter of discretion in the Departments. The Departments estimate for their printing, and they disburse the amount appropriated as they see fit. I have called attention to this subject repeatedly, and I am very glad that the Senator has now called attention to it. I think the heads of the Departments ought never to order such printing. I suppose they do it at the suggestion of their subordinates, and perhaps without much reflection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I had sent me the other day a copy of a report of one of the institutions of this District, which is printed in elegant style—how large a number I do not know—printed at the Government Printing Office, with plates of a very expensive character; and I was very much astonished to see it.

Mr. ANTHONY. What was the book?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The report of one of the institutions of this District—the Women's Lying-in Hospital.

Mr. ANTHONY. That was printed by one of the Departments—probably by the Interior Department. It was not ordered by Congress, I think; and I fancy that is a scientific book, like the Medical and Surgical History of the War, which is an expensive work and full of expensive engravings, but I thought that that ought to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly it is a scientific work; but my inquiry is, how such things as that get in print through the Government Printing Office?

Mr. ANTHONY. It must be done by order of the head of the Department in which it is printed and be taken out of the amount which the Senator from Maine allows him for his public printing. The Senator from Maine can restrict that. It is utterly impossible for the Committee on Printing to do it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from Maine is trying to get a little information, which the Senator from Rhode Island certainly has, but the Senator from Maine has not, to enable him to act discreetly.

Mr. SARGENT. The last Congress, in the hope of enforcing some degree of responsibility in the printing of the Departments, made for the first time a provision that the amount of printing required by each Department should be estimated for, that the estimates should be submitted to Congress, and the amount appropriated which each Department said it required to carry it through the year. This was done because year by year, and every year, the increase had been great in the cost of public printing. The honorable Senator from Rhode Island says that there is a large variety of kinds of printing that are now being done at the Public Printing Office which were not done several years ago; but everything that is done now was done four years ago, and during the last four years there has been a continued increase in the cost of public printing to a most extraordinary degree; and I find, by looking at the estimates laid before us at this session, that we are asked for nearly a quarter of a million more for printing for the next year than we appropriated for the current year. The appropriations for the public printing of the current year were $2,053,500, and the estimates now ask $2,259,148.92 for next year.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is not that caused by the RECORD?

Mr. SARGENT. I understand that this is caused by the RECORD partially, but beyond the increase for that paper is an increase of nearly one hundred and seventy-two thousand dollars; and this is the ordinary scale on which the public printing piles up year by year. Now, sir, I wish to say, as this provision was incorporated into the appropriation bill of last year partly on my suggestion, that I am sorry to say it has totally failed; that the Departments, so far as my observation goes—and I have inquired into the matter at the Public Printing Office and elsewhere—have not felt restrained by the hint we gave them that they should be more economical. They in some instances do not confine themselves to the estimates. For instance, I am informed, and I suppose reliably as it comes from the Government Printing Office, that already at this time the Court of Claims has expended all which was then appropriated for its printing, and the amount it estimated was given to it, and exceeded it by $25,000. In the different Departments they seem to go on the idea, "Here is a certain amount given to us, and we had better use it up or it will go back to the Treasury." Hence we have this fancy binding, turkey-morocco edges, fanciful gilt-edged literature, in which the reports of the Departments, the surveys of exploring expeditions, the observations of those having charge of our medical colleges, &c., is contained, and a scale of extravagance seems to be indulged in that needs some sharp, cutting remedy.

Now, sir, the bill which is before the Senate does not propose a volume for general distribution, as I understand. It is rather for the accommodation of Congress that this increase is asked, and the volume itself is rather for the use of Congress and the different Departments; but there is a proposition pending before the committee of which the honorable Senator from Rhode Island is chairman, referred to it yesterday on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, to print the Agricultural Report for 1872 and 1873. If this is favorably reported, it looks to the distribution of 640 copies of each of these reports, or 1,280 copies of them by each Senator, and about the same amount for each Member and Delegate of the House. There is no provision of law made by which these books may be distributed. The postage on each one of them is forty cents. That is $512 for each Senator to distribute his share.

If it was intended when the franking privilege was repealed that Senators should pay for the distribution of the Agricultural Report, alone costing $512, and then pay for mailing the Report on Commerce and Navigation, the Report of the Coast Survey, the volume of Commercial Relations, the educational report, the reports of surveys, and all the other public reports, that is something very inconsistent with the clamor which has been raised in the country, and which has found a very considerable echo at the other end of the Capitol, for the reduction of the pay which was fixed at the time that repeal took place.

Sir, by the closest calculation I can make of the expenses of postage of a Senator or a member of the House for sending out the amount of public documents we have heretofore sent out, it is $2,000 for each Congress, or $1,000 per annum. I do not believe Senators will do this. I know that up to the present time it has not been done; that the lower rooms of the Capitol are cumbered with books heretofore ordered to be printed by Congress; that whole rooms are choked up with them, and they are not sent out. The price of mailing all these reports under the present postage law and the cost of sending them out is very high indeed. For instance, the postage on the Report on Commerce and Navigation is 42 cents, on the educational report 52 cents for each volume, and on the report of the Secretary of War as printed last year it is $2.16, and on the Report of the Secretary of State $1 for each volume, making up the full amount to which I have referred.

Now, sir, the only hope of economy by the repeal of the franking privilege is by restricting the amount of printing, is by voting down such resolutions as were yesterday referred to the committee of which the Senator from Rhode Island is chairman, because there has been no economy—there can be no saving—in the carrying of the mails or in the administration of the postal system. The mails are not carried for a dollar less in any part of the country. I doubt if it can be asserted by any one that they are. A large portion of the mail-carrying expenses is for the railway postal service, and the amount of that is fixed by law. The limit was increased last year about the time of the repeal of the franking privilege. That, of course, remains unchanged, and so through all the country.

But there are certain additional costs which necessarily arise out of the new system. I understand there have been $100,000 spent for scales for weighing matter for the different offices of Congress, in the different Departments, and throughout the country. There has been the cost of making dies for new stamps; the cost of printing those stamps on expensive paper and by a delicate process; the pay of clerks to affix those stamps and to weigh the matter. There has been a continual expense in every direction, and the only saving is a mere nominal one; that is to say, the Government takes out of its left-hand pocket to put into its right-hand pocket. It provides for the Treasury Department between three and four hundred thousand dollars for its postage, which is the nominal amount which goes to correct an apparent deficiency in the Post-Office Department, whereas the only expenditure is the cost, perhaps, of ten or fifteen thousand dollars, which it may cost that Department to print the stamps for the Treasury Department, and which ten or fifteen thousand dollars is a dead loss to the Government. But the loss comes in other directions. I am informed that orders have been issued by some of the Departments to their subordinates in sending documents or reports to the Departments—and the rule has been adopted also in sending out reports or documents from the Departments to their subordinates in different parts of the country—that where the postage would be three, four, or seven dollars nominally, though the cost to the Government would of course only be the cost of printing the stamps affixed, if by express the matter could be sent for two, three, or six dollars respectively, the matter should be sent by express. Nominally it might cost $7 to send matter by mail, but it is sent by express at an actual cost of $6.50. Of course, the actual cost and loss to the Government is direct to the amount paid to the express company. How far that abuse (for it seems to me it is an abuse) has gone, I know not. The object, of course, is simply to show that the Departments are economical; that, if we for the Treasury Department appropriate $300,000 for the expense of its postage, it has saved $100,000, and that amount has been nominally covered back into the Treasury; but to save $100,000, which was merely a nominal consideration with the Government, its actual expense being the mere cost of printing the stamps, they may have paid $75,000 to the express companies to carry the Government matter.

So, I say, that since the repeal of the franking privilege, by the necessary effect of the law repealing it and by abuses—and I characterize the conduct I have referred to and the orders I have mentioned as abuses—the cost to the Government has been greater than it was before. Meanwhile the people have been deprived of the seeds of the Agricultural Department, the farmers have been deprived of the Agricultural Reports which are piled up here in our rooms, the merchants are deprived of our Reports on Commercial Relations, the miners in my State and all through the mining Territories lose the Report on the Mining Resources of the United States; and so all through all departments of business of the country, the information which it was designed should be furnished to them is denied to them by this repeal of the franking privilege, and nothing saved.

Now, if you say the members of Congress should pay for sending out these reports, I say in the first place it would cost us about two thousand dollars to do it, and the salary should, of course, be increased to meet that additional expense. But if members of Congress should pay for sending them out, why should they not pay for the printing of them? Why should the Government print them for us? If we are not to furnish this information in this form, why not we print it? Why not Senators pay the expense of folding these documents? It costs $70,000 to run the folding-room of the Senate for carting, &c., in order to get those documents to the mail. Why not assess that among the Senators? If you will reckon the amount of postage at $2,000 charged to each Senator, and so throughout Congress, you will find that the $70,000 added would scarcely make an appreciable difference.

Sir, I say that the only hope of economy under the repeal of the franking privilege is by abolishing the printing of these documents or by greatly restricting it. Therefore I am not prepared, as this is the only chance for economy, to vote for the bill now before us, because it is a measure that increases the public printing; and I certainly shall refrain from voting for the other proposition which was yesterday referred to the Printing Committee, because I can see no mode by which these documents can be sent out without impoverishing Senators, which certainly cannot be the design of the country. I prefer, if it is done, that we should go to the whole cost of the matter, and make a merit of it. If our private fortunes are to be encroached upon, if we are not only not to receive an adequate salary for our services, but are compelled to pay out of our own resources for sending this information to the people, I should like to be generous in it and pay also for the printing, pay for the folding, and all expenses to get this information to the people. Unless a radical measure of that kind is proposed, I am not prepared to go half way.

Mr. ANTHONY. This book is not for distribution, and the number that is ordered now is 250 less than was ordered two years ago. The permanent law orders 750, and with the increase in the business of all the Departments, and with the increase of the number of officers to whom this book is necessary for reference, there has been some additional number printed, not for distribution, for it is not given to Senators and Representatives, but all goes to the Secretary of the Interior, who supplies each Senator and each Representative with one copy. The Secretary of the Interior writes to me that the "Biennial Register is now prepared for the press," and says:

> My object in acquainting you with this fact is that some action may be taken to increase the number to be printed, if such a measure shall meet the approval of Congress.
> The law authorizes the printing of only 750 copies, which the experience of the last few years has shown are insufficient to supply the members of Congress and officials in the Executive Departments, who really need this book, finding, as they do, that it is a valuable aid in the transaction of the public business; and this increase in the number of copies to be furnished is the more necessary now as the House of Representatives is much larger than formerly.
> The Committee on Printing of the last Congress added 1,000 to the usual number, which has enabled the Department to reserve enough to furnish the new members of the present Congress; but if the supply now be doubled, that is adding 750 more, it will be amply sufficient to meet the demand.

The honorable Senator from California, I think, must be mistaken when he says that any Department has drawn all its money appropriated for printing and has ordered additional printing. I am quite sure that the Congressional Printer has printed for no Department one dollar's worth beyond the amount appropriated. He has no right to do it, and I am quite sure he has not done it. In fact he has called my attention to the fact that the appropriation would apparently be insufficient for some of the Departments, because the amount was nearly expended; and he said that he had no right to print, and that he had not printed anything, not a dollar, beyond the amount appropriated by law. If the amount appropriated is too large, then the fault remains with my friend from Maine, but must be shared with my friend from California, both of whom are on the committee appointed to supervise these appropriations. The Committee on Printing have nothing to do with it.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to remark to my friend that it is impossible for us to keep down the appropriations if these orders are continually made for additional printing. Therefore, the responsibility does not rest with us. We can only carry out the law as it is.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is a very small amount.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My friend from Rhode Island has a very seductive way of getting propositions through here in the morning, and that is one reason why I arrested his attention at this moment. I have not seen a determination at this session of Congress to look particularly in regard to any excesses which lie in the direction of expenditures for public printing, as well as other things; and it seemed to me we might begin exactly at this point. But I see I am to be baffled in that. He makes it so plausible to the Senate that I have no doubt the whole Senate will think this is a good thing to do, though I do not myself, because I think the information lies about us in different sources, though not in so convenient a form as the book will give it.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is not the point to arrest any expenditure in regard to printing. This Blue Book, as it is called, is made up of compilations from the different Departments of the Government, all of which are in type and here put together in a condensed form in one book, and 750 copies are printed and bound for our convenience. It costs nothing, therefore, but the binding in condensed form, in one book, various reports that are published according to law. Now, Mr. President, the cost of this book is not as much as the useless cost daily made by either House of Congress in printing bills. Here is a volume of bills laid on our table this morning. The cost of these bills is enormous, for sixteen hundred copies of each are printed, and probably there are not ten that will ever be reported. There is more cost every day in the printing of bills uselessly than in printing and distributing this Official Register.

I intend to act with the Senator from California, and I shall vote against every proposition to print public documents until some provision is made for their distribution. It is utterly idle, it seems to me, for us to authorize the distribution of 250,000 copies of the Agricultural Reports when they lie in piles about this Capitol, and cannot be distributed except by the expenditure of forty cents on each volume by the members of Congress; and as I hope to see the salary bill passed, it can hardly be expected that our constituents look to us to distribute these documents out of our pay. The best mode is to put a stop to the publication of all extra documents, and let the law stand by which any citizen of the United States can order any document he chooses by writing to the Public Printer and sending the actual cost. If the people do not want the documents, and are not willing to pay the actual cost of the paper and printing, it seems to me there is no great occasion to provide for distributing them. I, for one, give fair notice that I shall vote against every proposition to print extra documents that requires me to distribute them, without any means provided by law by which I can send them out unless I pay the postage on them. I will not pay the postage on the mass of documents that are distributed to me as a Senator. I could not do so out of my compensation.

Mr. BAYARD. I am very glad, indeed, to hear that there is a spirit of reform and economy in respect to the public printing and in post-office expenditures; but I hope it will not stop with the printing of public documents. I trust it may go a little further, and that the country may be saved the absurd expense which all of us have witnessed in the last vacation, of receiving little bundles of seed-wheat and seed-oats and other seeds for distribution, upon which the postage to and fro and the ordinary cost brings seed-wheat to the farmer at about eighteen or twenty dollars a bushel. We all know that just now there is a very tender interest felt in some portions of the country for the agriculturists, and no doubt there will be many champions for the agriculturists hereafter who have not been heard of much until this time; and I suggest that this little measure to prevent the benefit to the farmers in this country of receiving their seed-wheat at about eighteen or twenty dollars a bushel may be included in the proposed reform of stopping the printing of public documents when they will not be transmitted at the individual cost of members of Congress.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I rise, partly in self-protection, to correct a statement made by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who is usually so accurate. His statement that the Agricultural Report is lying in piles about the Capitol will bring upon us a deluge of letters in a few days for that very report. [Laughter.] The last Agricultural Report published was that of 1871. There was no appropriation made to publish the report of 1872, and I believe there were no copies published except about one thousand, which the Commissioner had published at his own expense, or at the expense of his Department, if he has a contingent fund. I know I have been receiving so many letters requesting the report of 1872 that it is some labor to answer the correspondents who want it. I rise now so that the statement of the Senator from Ohio, who is generally so accurate, may not bring down upon us that portion of our constituency which the Senator from Delaware says is receiving at this time the kind attentions of all the persons in public life.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, I will tell him for his information that I have received a notice, and I presume he has, of a list of public documents that await my order for distribution, and there are over two hundred volumes of them; and among the rest there are some Agricultural Reports.

Mr. ANTHONY. Thirteen.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; not many, it is true, but there are at least two hundred volumes of public documents that are now ready for distribution by every Senator, and the question is how to distribute them; whether he shall pay about $200 to distribute them——

Mr. MORTON. What would the postage amount to?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not sure. The postage on some of them would vary from thirty to eighty cents.

Mr. ANTHONY. On some over a dollar.

Mr. SHERMAN. I could not tell how much the postage would be. I did not examine that matter. I have got the books and will send them to anybody who wants them, provided they send the postage.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Ohio, while he is up, with reference to distributing these documents. I think we might do it without violating conscience or law. There seems to be a large fund in the two Houses of Congress without any particular denomination or name. Members seem to be distressed about getting rid of a portion of their pay; and the Treasurer of the United States seems to be distressed as to what shall be done with it. Nobody will accept it, and it is floating around. Could we not amend the bill so as to call that a general conscience fund and apply it as postage on these documents, and allow the people to have the benefit of them? [Laughter.] I think we might do that.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLMENT AND LICENSE OF VESSELS.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 191) to amend the act entitled "An act relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels," to report it back without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to extend the provisions of the act relating to the enrollment and license of vessels navigating the western rivers and the waters on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, otherwise than by sea, approved February 28, 1865, to include all vessels of the United States navigating the waters of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. TIPTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 217) granting a pension to Julia A. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRATT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 218) to enable the Secretary of the Interior to make final settlement with the Pottawatomie Indians of Michigan and Indiana under treaty stipulations existing with them; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. AMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 219) for the relief of Newton Knight and others, citizens of Mississippi, therein named; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 220) to authorize the appointment of a major in the artillery of the Army of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and, together with a petition of Captain and Brevet Brigadier-General James A. Robertson, United States Army, accompanying it, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 221) to fund the sum due the Prairie band of Pottawatomie Indians under the provisions of the treaty of February 27, 1867, and to transfer and fund any sum which may be found due from the Citizens' band of the Pottawatomies to the Prairie band, according to an agreement entered into between said bands July 18, 1873, and to use both principal and interest for the civilization of said Indians; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 222) to extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for the services of James Witherell, Ross Wilkins, and Solomon Sibley in adjusting titles to land in Michigan; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 223) for the relief of the Mission of Saint James; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. LEWIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 224) to incorporate the Washington City Inebriate Asylum in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOGY. At the last session of Congress, perhaps on the last day of the session, a bill for the relief of the estates of Abel Gilbert and William Gerrish, late copartners in business under the style of Gilbert & Gerrish, was passed, but was not signed by the President for the want of time. I wish to introduce the same bill again with a memorial accompanying it, and ask to have them referred to the Committee on Claims.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 225) for the relief of the estates of Abel Gilbert and William Gerrish, late copartners in business under the style of Gilbert & Gerrish; which was read twice by its title, referred, with the accompanying memorial, to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARPENTER (Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, in the chair) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 226) to provide for printing for the Supreme Court; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CARPENTER. I wish to state in explanation of this bill that in consequence of the Supreme Court meeting now as they do, in October instead of the first Monday of December, they have exhausted the fund which was provided for printing records, &c., for the court, and it is therefore necessary to pass the bill at once. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF 1812.

Mr. HOWE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency and the justice of placing all surviving soldiers of the war of 1812, who have been honorably discharged, upon the pension roll, irrespective of the duration of their service.

SUBSISTENCE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it hereby is, instructed to inquire into the state of the law respecting the discharge from prison of persons committed thereto by the courts of the United States, and into the expediency of providing for furnishing to such persons the means of temporary subsistence.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, communicating, in reply to a resolution of the Senate of March 11, 1873, information in regard to the expediency of dedicating to public use a part of the island of Mackinac; which, on motion of Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PROPOSED HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. CONOVER. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote taken yesterday on the indefinite postponement of the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives relative to a recess for the holidays. I do not wish action on it now, but desire the motion to be entered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

COTTON SEIZURES AT THE SOUTH.

Mr. GORDON. I desire to get the action of the Senate on a resolution presented by me on the 10th of December, asking for information in relation to the number of bales of cotton seized after the war, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. GORDON on the 10th instant:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report, for the information of the Senate—

1st. The number of bales of cotton seized under orders from the Department after the close of the war; from whom taken; by whom taken; by whom and when sold, and where sold, and at what price; and what disposition was made of the proceeds, and when and how much of the same went into the Treasury; and what disposition was made of the proceeds before being paid into the Treasury.

2d. That he report a list of the claims filed before him under the act of March, 1872, showing the name of each claimant, and how much cotton claimed was alleged to have been taken from each, and when.

3d. That he state the amount of expenses deducted from the proceeds of the sales of the cotton, and whether the same were allowed by the Department, and in whose favor.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would suggest to the Senator from Georgia whether the information called for under the first head is not already in possession of the legislative department of the Government upon former resolutions either of the House or of the Senate? I think it must be so.

Mr. GORDON. I am not aware of it if it is; but it may be so. If the Senator can satisfy me that that is so I am willing that that portion of the resolution be stricken out.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot of course without examination refer to the document, but I am quite sure that the information under the first head has been communicated to Congress.

Mr. GORDON. It would be very little trouble to repeat it. It may be in the other branch; I think it is hardly in this. I hope that the resolution will pass in full.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The only objection, perhaps, is one of expense. If it is reported again it will be printed again; and I have no idea that it possesses general public importance.

Mr. GORDON. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he is positive that that information has been given?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot say that I am positive, but I have no doubt about it.

Mr. SUMNER. I would suggest to my colleague whether he might not introduce the words "so far as not already communicated to Congress."

Mr. BOUTWELL. That would answer.

Mr. SUMNER. That would prevent a repetition.

Mr. GORDON. I have no objection to that modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia accepts the modification.

Mr. CONKLING. May we hear the resolution read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution as modified.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have seen that document. In 1865–'66, when the cotton claims, as they were called, came up, there was quite a large document. I think it would be unreasonable to require it all to be copied. It is in the public documents of 1865–'66, I think. Mr. Fessenden, as Secretary of the Treasury, made such a report, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution has been modified so as not to call for information that has been heretofore furnished.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is made clear, and nothing is called for but what has not already been communicated to Congress, I have no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia to let the resolution lie over until to-morrow, till we can ascertain whether all the information that he desires is not already here.

Mr. GORDON. It has been lying here now since the 10th. We shall adjourn in a few days; and if the information has not already been given to the Senate, our recess will afford opportunity to the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish it. I think the Senate is as ready to act upon it now as it will be at any other time.

Mr. HOWE. I do not think there can be any objection to the passage of the resolution as it now stands. Some of that information, I think, is already before the Senate; but there is considerable of it that is not, and I think the Senate would desire to have it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report for the information of the Senate, so far as such information has not already been communicated to either House of Congress—

1st. The number of bales of cotton seized under orders from the Department after the close of the war; from whom taken; by whom taken; by whom and when sold, and where sold, and at what price; and what disposition was made of the proceeds, and when and how much of the same went into the Treasury; and what disposition was made of the proceeds before being paid into the Treasury.

2d. That he report a list of the claims filed before him under the act of March, 1872, showing the name of each claimant, and how much cotton claimed was alleged to have been taken from each, and when.

3d. That he state the amount of expenses deducted from the proceeds of the sales of the cotton, and whether the same were allowed by the Department, and in whose favor.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOURS OF SESSION.

Mr. HITCHCOCK submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That on and after Monday next the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be ten o'clock a. m.; and that the Senate take a recess daily from five and a half to seven o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask that the message of the House of Representatives be taken from the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a House bill.

The bill (H. R. No. 793) to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates was read twice by its title.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The motion was agreed to.

THE CURRENCY—SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, on the special order, the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance some days ago, it is my wish to address the Senate in expressing my views; but I am not prepared to do so to-day. Whether it is proposed to ask for action on it to-day I am not advised; but if it is deferred, I will seek to address the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has any Senator the floor on the pending proposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No one, unless the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I observe that several Senators have given notice of their desire to debate this proposition in the future; and in this way, it seems to me, the purpose which the Committee on Finance had in view in reporting the resolution will be defeated. We wished to get a general expression of the opinions of Senators upon the proposition as to whether our measures ought to tend toward the resumption of specie payments. Upon that general proposition every Senator has his mind made up practically. He has formed an opinion sufficient to give direction, at any rate, to the investigations to be made by the Committee on Finance. It is for that reason that I have not made any speech on the subject, nor sought to persuade any Senator to agree with me in opinion.

Now, it seems to me that we ought to have a vote on the pending resolutions without the formal debate that Senators seem to be drifting into. It seems to me that the tendency of the Senate is to enlarge this debate far beyond what there is occasion for. Of course, any measure of legislation which may be framed will be brought before the Senate for its consideration, and any discussion as to the details of the measure is manifestly out of order now. The only question now before the Senate is whether or not the Committee on Finance ought to have in view, during this session of Congress, some measure tending toward specie payments, and also the proposition submitted by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] that Congress ought to provide for the enlargement of the currency. These are general propositions that we ought to vote upon without any enlarged discussion. If we have got to postpone the decision of this preliminary question until speeches are made on this subject, and as to all the various plans submitted to us, of course we shall not get to an end of this preliminary discussion for two or three months.

I hope that the Senate will proceed to-day, without any more than a general expression of opinion upon the main proposition, and let the Senate Committee on Finance during the recess, or shortly after the recess, proceed to develop, if they can, some plan tending either to promote specie payments or to enlarge the currency. It is for this reason that I have not engaged in this debate, nor do I intend to do so. Every Senator can now express his opinion upon the general proposition whether we ought to enlarge the currency or whether we ought to tend toward specie payments. This is a question which has been in the mind of each Senator and before him for a year. There is not one here who has not his opinion formed to a certain extent. As to what particular measure will carry out this view, perhaps he is not prepared to vote on; but upon the general idea as to whether he wishes to advance the value of our currency to the gold standard, or whether without regard to that he desires to relieve the people by the issue of more paper money, each Senator certainly can vote now.

I trust, therefore, that Senators will not delay the passage of a resolution on this subject until they can exhaust themselves by elaborate, prepared speeches upon a most difficult question; but let us have at least now a preliminary indication or instruction from the Senate as to what they desire the committee to do. It is for that purpose that these resolutions were reported; and when they were reported I supposed we should have a vote upon them before the holidays, and I see no reason why we should not have a vote on them to-day.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance will pardon me if I suggest to him that it is possible other Senators may feel the difficulty which I have felt since the resolution was submitted to the Senate—that the Committee on Finance express no opinion as to the course of proceeding which by that committee is thought likely to tend toward the end contemplated by the resolution. I am prepared, for one, to say that I am in favor of a policy which will bring the volume of paper in the country to an equality, commercially, with coin; but I can conceive of ways of doing that to which I would be strenuously opposed. I am prepared to say further that a way usually accepted is a way which I do not approve; that is, the contraction of the volume of currency of the country. That policy tends, undoubtedly, to produce equality of value, but I apprehend that the shock to the country of entering upon and pursuing that policy would be detrimental to private and public interests. I prefer to adhere to the policy which we have pursued for the last five or six years, of maintaining steadily the volume of currency at the minimum point, as far as practicable, established by law, and waiting for the development of the resources of the country and the increase of business which in time—I cannot say how long a time will be required, but in time—will certainly bring the paper and the coin of the country to an equality in value commercially. Therefore I look with apprehension upon all the propositions which contemplate contraction of the currency.

After as careful an examination as I have been able to make of the various propositions submitted to the Senate and to the country, however described, I find that they are substantially of two sorts: they either contemplate contraction, or they contemplate expansion; and each and every of these propositions I think it the interest of the country to resist. If we expand the currency permanently, we postpone the day for the resumption of specie payments; if we contract the currency by process of law, we bring the business of the country to a stand, we diminish the revenues, and by diminishing the revenues we render taxation inevitable and impair the credit of the country. All these are evils, either of which, considered separately, would in my judgment more than compensate for any gain we should realize by bringing the paper and the coin of the country to an equality in value at a comparatively early period.

These are general views. I do not purpose to-day to go into the argument, and I only respond for one to the appeal of the Senator from Ohio. I look, speaking generally, for the restoration of the credit of the country, in the particular now under consideration, to a development of its resources, and not to a financial measure specially so considered.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I do not propose to make a speech on the finances, but I want permission to say amen to the speech which has just been made by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] If I could add a word by way of exhortation, I do not know but that it would give me a little relief. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts, however, most fully, that the way to the redemption of your currency in specie is neither through contraction nor through expansion. I agree with all these expansionists, however, in one thing: that we have not money enough. That cannot be considered very strange when I say that in my judgment we have not a dollar of money in circulation, and I do not think I should be much mistaken if I said that we never did have a dollar of money in circulation. We have had in happier times something which resembled money very closely, which was made of the right material, and which would have been money if it had ever secured international recognition. We have had plenty of money, and I do not know but that we have plenty of money now; that is, money in the eye of the law, lawful money; but in the eye of commerce I think we have no money now, and never shall have until we get something that the commercial world will accept as money. That, I suppose, this Congress cannot create. It can come pretty near to it, and has in former times furnished a circulation which bore a strong resemblance to commercial money. It was not absolutely respected outside of our own country, but was so easily transmuted into what other countries did acknowledge to be money that it was about as good as money all over the world. I should be glad, therefore, to see more of this kind of money. At the present time we have not anything bearing the slightest resemblance to it. We have nothing but counterfeits, and I do not want to see any more of them. I think there are two very sound reasons why we should issue no more of this stuff that we call money. One of those reasons—I do not know how much weight it ought to have with us—is that it is dishonest to issue it.

I have been told that the world is some six thousand years old. I cannot say anything to the contrary of that estimate. We ought in that time to have learned something. If we have learned anything in that time I think we have learned this: that fraud is not fair and that lying is an instrument of fraud, and that when a man says, or a Government says, day after day and month after month and year after year, that he or it will do a thing, and never does it at all, it bears such a strong resemblance to lying that it is not worth while to undertake to discriminate between them.

Mr. President, you have been circulating through this country, in the name of the Government of the United States, promises to pay money. You have not redeemed those promises; you have not made the slightest effort to redeem one of them; and now pretty much everybody knows that there is no resemblance between those promises and money, and that there is no verity in those promises. Still we have to take them. There is that difference between Government counterfeiting and ordinary counterfeiters. We do not, any of us, take the work of an ordinary counterfeiter except when we are deluded into it. We take these shams per force of law. The Government is a little worse than an ordinary counterfeiter in that respect.

There was a good, wholesome reason why we should have substituted once paper for coin, for a metallic currency. That reason passed by long ago. I should be glad to get all this out of the way, as the Senator from Massachusetts says he would be, and put something else in the place of it. But I do hold that if this Government adds a dollar or a fragment, a square inch, to the volume of these broken promises—it will not do to call the Government a criminal, I suppose, but it will come too near the perpetration of a crime to suit me.

For these reasons, very briefly stated, I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that we ought not to add anything to this kind of circulation. I think the Secretary of the Treasury has made a very great mistake in allowing a dollar of this circulation to get out upon the country. I do not stop to consider his legal right to do so. It would not add much to my respect for the measure if his right under the law was ever so clear, nor detract much from the measure of my respect for it if there was not a shadow of law for it. I cannot help regarding it as a great abuse of discretion, if the discretion was in him, and I hope Congress will not, by any act of its, authorize the slightest enlargement of that sort of circulation; but I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts, that it will not do for Congress to exert its authority now, or at any time, in the direction of contracting the circulation. That, I think, is altogether too harsh a remedy. You have to call on the people to contribute to the wants of the Treasury pretty large sums of that which stands in their hands in lieu of money, whether it be money or not, and which costs them that which money always costs, to carry on the Government. We know very well that the people can contribute a great deal more in the way of taxes when these contributions are regularly returned in the way of disbursements; but when you call upon them to contribute three hundred millions a year to pay the expenses of the Government, which is returned to them in the disbursements of the Government, and in addition to that call upon them to contribute fifty or one hundred millions a year not to be returned to them at all, but to be confiscated—that is a pretty harsh kind of taxation, and I do not think the country will stand it. It was tried once. The country did not stand it long; and I hope never to see it tried again. So that I cannot join my voice with any of those who insist upon having an addition to this paper circulation. And, on the contrary, I have not the slightest sympathy with those who call upon the Congress of the United States to curtail that circulation. So far, I think, I sympathize with everything that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has said.

Now, I want to contribute not a new suggestion, for I believe I have thrown it out to the Senate once before. I want to contribute an old suggestion—that if the Government are committed to the doctrine of treating this stuff for the present as money, we should just stand there and not make this other mistake which I see some gentlemen in and out of Congress are inclined to insist upon, that is, committing the Government to the policy of undertaking to treat this three hundred and fifty or three hundred and sixty millions as bank paper and redeem it, exchange coin for it day after day. I do not want to see the Government committed to that, for this plain reason: It has been agreed to pay money, and there is that reason why it should try to do it. There is a better reason why it should not try to do it, and that is, that, in my judgment, it is utterly impossible for the Government to do it. There is not a bankrupt in the United States to-day who cannot just as well and as successfully undertake to redeem the circulation of the United States as the Government itself. It is beyond the power of a government—of this Government or of any other—to keep afloat a paper circulation convertible at all times into coin. I think that can be demonstrated if anything can be demonstrated; but I shall not stop to try to demonstrate it now.

I do not want to see the Government undertake to do that; but if you will do just this much you will content me, and I suppose you will content somebody else by not doing it. If the Government will say to the holders of this paper which you call greenbacks or legal-tenders, "We cannot pay you the coin for this; but when you get tired of carrying it as money and treating it as money and pretending that it is money; when you have borne about with you the sham just as long as you care to bear it, you may bring it back to the Treasury and we will take it and will give you our promises to pay at some other day, and pay you interest on those promises." That is not a full compliance with the promise which we made originally; but that is just what every debtor, if he has any honesty and not sufficient ability to meet his obligations in full, is always prepared to do.

But, sir, I think this should be accompanied by one safeguard; you should say at the same time that whoever wants to add anything, not to the money of the country, but the paper circulation of the country, if they will go to the Treasury and do what the existing banks have been required to do, deposit bonds, they may have the percentage of circulation which is accorded to banks under the existing law. I think that legislation ought to respect the present volume of the currency so far as to make one of these steps contingent upon the other; that the funding of the legal-tender notes of the Government into bonds should proceed only pari passu with the exchanging of those bonds for your banking circulation. Then the holders of this paper will have the right to exchange it if they choose to exchange it, and have the right to do so just as far and as fast as they choose and are able to substitute their own promises for these promises of the Government. Of course we shall lose interest just as fast as that is done. I do not deprecate that at all; I do not regret it at all; for I do not believe the Government has any more right to borrow money without paying interest upon it, if the lenders want interest, than I have. I do not believe they can borrow money without paying interest to their profit and to the profit of the country, any more than I can borrow it to the profit of the lender.

Mr. President, this is all I care to say this morning.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President, I do not believe there is much difference in this body as to the question whether our currency and gold shall eventually be made equivalent. As far as I have observed, from what has fallen from the lips of Senators, I am satisfied that the difference lies more in the method of reaching rather than the fact of such result.

I listened this morning with a great deal of attention to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who went so far as to declare that he looked with apprehension upon any method of arriving at specie resumption which contemplated contraction, and added, in force of the proposition that he took, that we could not look upon the prostration of the country without anxiety.

Now, Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senate to this fact: whatever may be said here, it cannot be denied that prostration exists now in the financial avenues of the country, and it is a very grave question whether that prostration is to be continued by the let-alone policy, or whether it becomes the duty of legislators to adopt such a policy as will secure prosperity instead of this prostration. The difficulty of agreement has been found in the committee, and this resolution appears before the Senate, to invite the expression of the Senate upon the vital question whether we shall add to this prostration, or, by a moderate expansion, restore prosperity, and thus quicken the approach in value of gold and currency.

I cannot understand why, on the one hand, a Senator can with deliberation declare that our currency is an "engraved falsehood;" and on the other hand, another Senator, representing another part of the country, can declare that it is "counterfeit currency;" and in order to cast odium upon a circulating medium which has served such value to the country, can declare it also "stuff." If I mistake not, during the midst of the panic, it was such valuable "stuff" that citizens throughout the country, not excepting the Senator himself, were too glad to stuff their pockets and vaults with this same pitiable "stuff."

Now, sir, there are two methods of testing the value of this so-called "stuff." I do not now propose to enter at large into this discussion, but to draw attention to the fact that if it had not been for this very currency, called "stuff," we should have failed in the war, rebellion would have succeeded, and you would have had no country to use or appreciate any kind of currency or money. It was the exercise of constitutional power in this very issue which you are contemning and ridiculing that enabled the people to carry you successfully through the war when you had no other alternative, for you had no coin, and were driven to suspension. You were compelled to fall back upon your credit for resources, and you did it triumphantly.

I ask your attention to the two ways of measuring the value of this currency. What are they? Go into the markets; question Wall street; and the answer made in the midst of the panic was that the value of this currency was only 6 per cent. discount—94 cents to the dollar in gold. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] whether that be "stuff," whether that be "counterfeit money?" And I ask the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] if such is an "engraved falsehood?" If in market, in the midst of the panic, it was worth 94 cents, and to-day, I believe, is worth 90 cents in coin, then strictly, according to the epithets and estimate of these Senators, it would be 10 cents lie and 90 cents truth.

Mr. HOWE. O, no; that is not according to my mathematics. There is not a cent of truth in it; there are 100 cents of lie; but by virtue of a statute you compel the people of the United States to credit it with 90 cents.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Then the public hug that lie, and to-day appeal for more.

Mr. HOWE. Of course.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President, I am willing to go to the country with the Senator from Wisconsin or the Senator from Vermont on the question whether this currency is a lie or a truth. The people have decided the value of this currency in the shock of battle and in the toils of panic. Pronounced good by the people it cannot be made worthless by sneers. During the panic but little of it was converted into gold, showing that in their judgment they considered the currency nearly equal to gold. And I reiterate right here the fact which I stated before, that in that very period and moment the currency brought 94 cents in the market of the country in coin. How much this is "lie" and how much "truth" I leave to the mathematical astuteness of the Senator.

Now, I call attention to the other method of testing this currency, and it is by the Government itself, the author of the issue. It gives to the national banks 90 cents of currency upon its bonds. It either values its promises to pay in the form of bonds payable in the future at 90 cents truth and 10 cents lie, or else it considers the currency 10 cents lies and 90 cents truth. You may take either horn of the dilemma.

I am not discussing with the Senator the intrinsic value of this currency any more than I am discussing the intrinsic value of coin. Gold is a commodity, and finds its value in the market. This evidence of debt, this promise to pay, is not a commodity; it is a measure of exchange; but it obligates your whole Government and holds the aggregate wealth of the whole country in pledge for its security and ultimate payment. Therefore, I say that the exchange of a bond for this currency is merely putting off the period of payment. It is your greenback of to-day promising to pay in the distant future. In reality, it is begging the future to come to your rescue, saying that now you cannot pay, but by and by you hope to pay.

It is well known that every scheme that has been presented here against the plan of moderate expansion has been supplemented with this idea, that the Government shall issue bonds and accredit those bonds by paying interest at 5 or 6 per cent. in coin; simply retiring the greenbacks through bonds, exchanging non-interest-bearing promises for interest-paying one. Because the greenbacks are not paid now, the people are to be asked to issue bonds bearing 5 or 6 per cent. interest in coin, and hope for payment of principal hereafter. By this burden of coin interest you put value upon a form of national credit which you declare in the form of currency has no value whatever. We have heretofore found ourselves unable to meet our bond obligations, and have funded a portion of our debt, and we will do it again whenever the necessity arises. And this you call value and truth, I suppose, in the language of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.]

Now, sir, I want to dispel this delusion that the volume of the currency regulates the price of coin. I have a statement before me, which I have prepared with some care, showing the price of coin during different periods since the war broke out; and I find that when we had the most volume of circulation our coin was lower than it was when we had less volume. On the 1st of January, 1864, we had $603,000,000 of currency, and gold stood then at a premium of 55 per cent. On the 1st of December last the volume of currency was $765,000,000, and coin stood at a premium of 9 per cent. With that addition of $162,000,000 to the volume of the currency, coin stood at a premium of 46 per cent. less than in 1864.

So I might cite as well the close of 1866, when the largest volume of currency was in circulation—taking into account all forms of circulation, such as seven-thirties, certificates, and others, amounting altogether to $1,571,000,000—gold stood at only 34 per cent. premium, less than it did when we had but $603,000,000, the lowest volume, in 1864, by 21 per cent.

I might go through this whole list, and instance semi-annually the volume of the currency and the price of gold, and show conclusively what I have stated, that the volume of currency has not regulated the price of gold.

To assure this I will append the statement I have referred to right here, and let it speak for itself:

Mr. President, I state here my belief that if the Government had made its greenbacks a legal tender for all purposes, for customs dues as well as for other public and private debts, treating everybody alike, and then gone into the market and purchased its gold to meet its obligations instead of employing the agency of thousands of merchants to compete for and keep up the price of coin in the market, you would have struck the key-note and fully accredited your currency and made it equivalent to coin. So believing, and fortified by the experience of the past panic, when persons who discriminated at all did so in favor of greenbacks, I have followed that indication in the substitute that the Government shall issue all the currency and make it a legal tender for all purposes except customs and the interest on the public debt. I do not go as far as my judgment inclines, but prefer to go as far as my observation and experience justify. I do not propose to act upon theory or speculation. Senators cannot, however, gainsay the fact that greenbacks are worth more than national currency; and if that be the case, I trust the Senator from Wisconsin as well as other Senators will join me in any effort to accredit this "worthless stuff" by making it issuable by the Government and by making it lawful money. If Congress will adopt this measure, I am satisfied that by a moderate increase of the currency prosperity will be restored throughout the country, and by that prosperity the two forms of money will gradually come together, and, as we have seen, from month to month and year to year the approach will be certain, and within a few years currency become the equivalent of gold.

We need an expression of the Senate, and I trust that Senators will avail themselves, as I have no doubt they will, of the pendency of these resolutions to express their views on this question, which is the vital one, whether we shall come to resumption by prostration or by prosperity. We are not to consult in this our own convenience either. We are to heed the industrial stagnation, the losses, the misery that appeal with a voice that cannot be shut out from this Chamber—a desperation and misery that may not be felt here, closed in this Capitol, but a calamity that is broadcast throughout the land. I solemnly believe, in my business judgment, that the only true way for relief is to give us a moderate increase of currency—not inflation, as Senators may strive to call it, nor unlimited expansion, but merely an increase demanded by the natural progress and industrial necessities of the country. Give us that, sir, and you will stimulate prosperity and enter the highway to an earlier resumption.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I do not desire to make a speech on this subject, but before voting on this resolution I wish to give some reasons for my vote. In the first place, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to what this resolution is. It contains two propositions, and I will now read the first one:

> That it is the duty of Congress during its present session to adopt definite measures to redeem the pledge made in the act approved March 18, 1869, entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," as follows:
> "And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest praticable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin."

The question first presented is whether it is the duty of Congress at this session to take definite measures for the redemption of the United States notes in coin, for that is the pledge given in the act of 1869. I agree that the faith of this Government is pledged to redeem what are called greenbacks in coin. I agree to that as fully and as strongly as anybody; and I further agree that we are to keep steadily in view what is called a return to specie payments; but the question is whether it is our duty at this session of Congress, at this time, in the present condition of the country, to look to and adopt such measures; and at this point I differ with the committee. There is a wrong time to do a right thing; and in my opinion this is not the time in which we should adopt definite measures to redeem these notes in coin, unless the time be put off so far that it will not increase the present embarrassment or intensify the effects of the panic upon the country.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] has repeatedly declared before the Senate, and I think in substance the other day, and that declaration was made very strongly this morning by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] that every day we failed to redeem the legal-tender notes the faith of the public was broken; that we were "lying," and that the country was deceived. I desire to enter my protest against that language. The Government is not liable to that charge. The Senator from Massachusetts said the other day in his argument that it was a promise to pay coin upon demand, and that is the literal effect of that promise; and yet when that promise was made it was understood by everybody that it was to be broken for an indefinite length of time. If it was to be redeemed literally and at that time, there would have been no use in issuing greenbacks. The understanding of the country was, and nobody can be deceived upon that point, that the Government was to redeem those notes in coin when it was practicable to do so, and not before; and the question may be fairly presented, has it up to this time been practicable?

My friend from Wisconsin, after making those strong declarations about fraud and the Government's lying, went on within five minutes afterward to say that the redemption of those notes in coin now was an impossibility; we had not the coin to do it. I might ask him whether we have had the coin at any time since those notes were issued to redeem them?

Mr. HOWE. The Senator did not quite comprehend me. I did not say that it was impossible to redeem those notes in coin. I said it was impossible for the United States Treasury to keep them in circulation constantly, redeemable in coin.

Mr. MORTON. I accept the correction on the part of my friend; but the point I now make in vindication of the course of the Government is, has it been practicable at any time since the end of the war to carry out the pledge to redeem those notes in coin? We cannot redeem them in coin unless we have the coin; but we have it not in any considerable amount, and we have never had it at any one time in any considerable amount.

Mr. SUMNER. Will my friend allow me just there to ask him whether in this interval we have not paid a considerable portion of the national debt, I think larger in amount than the outstanding legal-tenders?

Mr. MORTON. We have paid a larger amount of the national debt up to this time than the whole volume of legal-tender notes.

Mr. SHERMAN. And paid it in gold.

Mr. MORTON. We have paid it in gold, it may be said, by the sale of gold and the purchase of bonds, but nobody knows better than the chairman of the Committee on Finance that we have not had enough gold at any one time to authorize us or to make it safe to begin the redemption of those notes in coin. We have never had, I believe, at any one time, more than $30,000,000 of gold, excluding special deposits, at our command, and that quantity was not sufficient to authorize us to begin the work of redemption.

Mr. SUMNER. My friend is aware that when we had the gold we paid it out in paying off the debt, to redeem the bonds, instead of paying the running daily obligations of the Government.

Mr. MORTON. Certainly, Mr. President, if we had begun to pay the daily running obligations of the Government in coin when we had only forty or fifty millions of coin, and that coin worth a premium of forty, fifty, or sixty cents in the market, it would all have been taken up and the Government left bankrupt in coin in forty-eight hours. Do we not all understand that that was utterly impracticable?

Mr. SUMNER. I know my friend is anxious to elucidate the question, and therefore he will pardon me if while he is on that point I present him another aspect. Was not the original suspension of specie payments, making our paper inconvertible, essentially a war measure, to carry on the war; and therefore should it not have been terminated just as soon as possible immediately after the war? Should a war measure be prolonged indefinitely in a period of peace?

Mr. MORTON. I think I can agree with that proposition, and yet it does not change or affect the force of my argument. It was a war measure, and, as I have remarked before, the promise when those notes were issued was that they should be redeemed when it was practicable to do so. Sir, hostilities ceased seven years ago, but the consequences of the war are upon us to-day in a debt of more than two thousand million dollars. We see the effects of the war all around us, in every form, in a thousand shapes; and one of the consequences of the war to-day, in the language of my friend from Wisconsin, is that we are not able to-day to redeem those notes in coin.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana if he will not accept this as a definition of the actual promise that was made by those notes: that the Government promised to pay those notes whenever they could borrow the money represented by them at a fair rate of interest?

Mr. MORTON. No; I do not think I shall.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend allow me to remind him that by the very law which authorized their issue they were convertible either into coin or into a 6 per cent. bond of the United States?

Mr. HOWE. The first ones.

Mr. SHERMAN. And there has not been a day since the close of the war when that bond has not been worth from 10 to 30 per cent. above the value of these notes.

Mr. MORTON. There was a provision in the law authorizing the issue of the first one hundred and fifty millions of greenbacks to that effect. It was found that that provision would materially interfere with the ability of the Government to carry on the war, by preventing a further sale of bonds, and therefore it was afterward provided that at a subsequent day, some three or four months after the law was passed, I think the 1st of July, 1863, that privilege of converting the greenbacks into 6 per cent. bonds should terminate. The people, I think, had some three months given them in which to make that conversion—a very short time at least—and it was found necessary after that to cut off that privilege of conversion. Only one hundred and fifty millions had been issued up to that time. The subsequent issue of three hundred millions took place after that privilege was cut off.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; three hundred millions were issued before that convertibility clause was suspended.

Mr. HOWE. And the convertibility clause was cut off, if I remember aright, to enable the Treasury to float a 5 per cent. bond instead of a 6 per cent. bond.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I do not want to be drawn into making a long speech, and I should be glad to be allowed to go on without much interruption.

There is a sort of fanaticism about a "return to specie payments." I had it pretty bad once myself; but experience and the lapse of time have abated the violence of it in my case very considerably. I do not regard it as the panacea for all our ills. I recognize gold as the standard of value that we are bound to come back to at some time, but not until it is practicable to do so. The Bank of England suspended in 1797 by the order of the government, expecting to return to specie payments in a few months from that time, but did not for twenty-one years, because the condition of the country did not permit it. I am in favor of a return to specie payments whenever the condition of the country makes it practicable; and the question I submit upon this resolution is, whether this is the time to take definite measures for the redemption of the promise to pay these notes in coin.

My friend, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, for whose opinions on this subject I have the greatest respect, had a bill before the Senate at the last session providing what? Providing that the Government should on the 1st of January, 1874, which is just before us now, redeem these notes in coin, or agree to give those who presented them a 5 per cent. bond. That was not carrying out the promise. To carry out that promise you must pay to the holders of the notes coin, or give them an equivalent, which they have the option to accept—not of which we have the option. When the Government says, "I will give you coin, or I will pay you in a 5 per cent. bond at the option of the Government," nobody will pretend that that is a compliance with the promise. The holder of the greenbacks must have the option. As long as the Government has the option, it is no compliance with the promise. The bill of my friend, then, did not comply with the promise; and I understood from his speech a day or two ago that that is the substance of the proposition he now has to offer. Suppose we adopt his resolution—that we will pay to the men who hold the greenbacks coin or give them a 5 per cent. bond at our option, not at theirs. The 5 per cent. bond would not, then, in all probability, be worth par. It would probably be somewhere about half-way between the present premium on gold and par.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is at par now.

Mr. MORTON. The 5 per cent. bond is at par now because it can only be purchased at par, in gold; but whenever you permit a 5 per cent. bond to be purchased of the Government for greenbacks instead of gold, you will have no more gold purchases of 5 per cent. bonds. The argument of my friend is that that will have the effect at once of bringing greenbacks up to par value with gold. I do not believe that. I believe it will increase the value of the greenbacks, and decrease the value of the 5 per cent. bond, and the 5 per cent. bond will float somewhere between the present premium on gold and par. Because a 5 per cent. bond is at par now, when the Government will only sell it at par for gold, does not prove that it will be at par in the market when the Government sells it for greenbacks.

Mr. President, is this the time (and that is the main question I rose to discuss) to adopt definite measures to return to specie payments? I submit that we should come to specie payment in prosperous times, and not in adversity; that any definite measures now to return to specie payment in a short time will create a further shrinkage of values. Everybody understands that. And now, when we want relief, when we want to come out from under the load that is upon us, it is proposed that we shall adopt measures that will increase that burden, and diminish the general prices of property and labor.

I wish to discuss this question in reference to what my friend from Ohio said the other day. He gave us to understand that if we should adopt this resolution the committee would present a measure like that we had before us last winter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon; I made no such statement. I simply stated my own views. I said that no one had authority to speak for the committee. I thought the Senator desired me to make a statement at that time, which I was not authorized to make, in order to enable him to make an argument on a basis not before the Senate. I will state, however, that my own opinion is that if we cannot pay our creditors what we agreed to pay them, we ought at least to do with them what every honest man would do—give them a note that will bear some kind of value in the money markets of the world. That is my position.

Mr. MORTON. Taking the statement of the chairman, the substance of it is that his views are in accordance with his former bill. I knew what his opinions were. I heard him make an able speech on the subject, in which he said that by offering to the holders of greenbacks within less than a year from that time, the 1st of January, 1874—he would now, perhaps, say the 1st of January, 1875—a 5 per cent. bond, in exchange for their greenbacks, it would have the effect of bringing the greenbacks up to par, because a 5 per cent. bond was worth par in gold. That was my friend's argument at that time, and I suppose it will be again. Suppose it has that effect; I ask the Senate if this is the time to adopt that measure? If you bring greenbacks up to par in twelve months, if you make them equal to gold in twelve months, you thereby increase their purchasing power 10 per cent.; that is to say, $1,000 in greenbacks will, on the 1st of January, 1875, purchase 10 per cent. more of property than they will purchase now, and a man who has to pay his debts by selling his property will have to sell 10 per cent. more of his property to pay the same amount of debt than he would have to do now. What is the effect of that? It makes every debt due to a creditor worth 10 per cent. more in twelve months than it is now, because when he gets it then it will procure 10 per cent. more of property than it does now. It enhances the difficulty of every debtor 10 per cent. in the payment of his debts, because it will take 10 per cent. more of his property to pay them.

Is the country prepared for that operation? Admitting that it has got to go through the process at some time, should it not be much more gradual? Should it not be distributed through two or three years? Ten per cent. increase in the difficulty of paying debts, 10 per cent. enhancement of the value of debts in twelve months, is more than twice the average profits of business in this country, taking all kinds of business and making an average.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Three times the average.

Mr. MORTON. My friend from Connecticut says it is three times the average profit of business. Therefore, I insist that that increase of 10 per cent. in the burden of paying debts, in the course of twelve months, will be disastrous; and when it comes upon the top of this panic, who can tell what the effects will be?

Mr. President, let me ask another question. It is said, and that has been the argument, that this is a good time to return to specie payments. I have heard it said by able men, "We have got pretty nearly down to the bed-rock now; it is a good time to return to specie payments." I ask this question: has this panic increased or does the present condition of things increase the facility of returning to specie payments? I say no. Why? Because while property has decreased in value and there has been a vast shrinkage in the price of property and in everything, still the same difference exists between greenbacks and gold that existed before the panic. Gold has now an average premium of 10 per cent. So it had before the panic took place. Therefore, if you still go down to gold value you must go down 10 per cent. more. So that the panic has not increased the facility of returning to specie payments, for you will have an additional shrinkage on the top of the shrinkage you have now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator from Indiana pardon me if I interrupt him to ask a single question?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suppose the Senator from Indiana recognizes the fact that during this panic we have had a very large addition to the circulation. How does he account for this shrinkage when the currency has been constantly and very largely augmented?

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend state how we have had large additions to the circulation?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. By the operation of the Treasury Department, in paying out, I think, nearly twenty-five millions in all—$18,000,000 of the $44,000,000 on hand that it calls its reserve fund—and some considerable amount that it had in the Treasury of notes, that it has paid out for the purchase of bonds.

Mr. MORTON. I am glad my friend mentions that, because I intended to refer to that very fact in defense of the action of the Administration on this subject. The depreciation in prices took place at once. It was the sudden result of the panic. There has been to some extent a reaction—not a very great one except in regard to a few things—and that reaction is mainly attributable, in my judgment, to what has been done by the Government in increasing the volume of circulation. The panic caused money to be hoarded, and the addition to the currency tends to revive confidence and call forth the hoarded money.

Mr. President, what was the cause of this panic? Was it caused by any defect in our currency? Talk about this much-abused currency! My friend from Wisconsin this morning spoke of it with the utmost contempt. He called it "stuff," and I think he used the words "vile stuff." I make the assertion that this panic was not brought about by any defect in the currency. It was not because the currency was irredeemable. It seems to me that I am authorized to make the assertion that the irredeemable character of the currency had nothing to do with the panic. Why, sir, when the panic took place the currency, greenbacks, national-bank notes, and bonds were the one thing that everybody had confidence in. While they lost faith in railroad bonds and stocks, and State stocks and everything else went down, the currency appreciated in value; the credit of the Government was the one thing that everybody leaned on.

Sir, the panic was not caused by the depreciation of the currency; and if it was not caused by that, I ask how you are to relieve the effects of the panic by taking steps to come to specie payments? The good physician always looks to the character of the disease, and what brought it about, before he attempts to prescribe; and when we look to the cause of this panic we find that it was not caused by any defect in the currency. The people have faith in our currency, more than they have ever had in any paper currency this nation has had heretofore. While we may abuse greenbacks, I tell you the nation has faith in them. The great body of the people love them, and nearly all of them want more. What was it that caused this panic? Why, sir, it was just such a cause as operates in countries where they have no currency but gold and silver; and I make the statement that panics occur quite as frequently where the currency is gold and silver as where it is paper convertible into coin. They have had two panics in England when their currency was upon a gold basis since we have had one in this country. Panics are just as likely to occur in countries where they have nothing but gold and silver as in other countries. Panics do not spring out of the character of the currency generally, but out of some sudden and unexpected event. A panic in finance is just like a panic in the army. It is generally caused by some sudden event that confuses the minds of men and destroys confidence, and it has nothing to do with the character of the currency.

Why, sir, they have had a dozen panics in England worse than this, not one of which grew out of the currency but out of other causes, generally some sudden thing that surprised and confused and for a time stupefied men and made them all stand still. Now money is scarce. It is all here. There was plenty of money the morning that Jay Cooke failed, and none to be had that night. It stood still just where it was that day. It stopped circulating; and it is pretty much there now; just as if the blood in a man's veins should suddenly cease to circulate—it is all there in the arteries, veins, and tissues, but it does not circulate; and that was the effect of this panic. Jay Cooke failed—a great banker, who had been largely connected with the Government in the sale of our bonds; who had places of business all over the country and through Europe; the most prominent banker on this continent—and when he failed the people said,

"If Jay Cooke cannot be trusted, who can? If his banks are not good, what banks are good?" And then there came a run upon all the banks, more or less, and upon a few to their destruction. The banks at once refused to discount, and most of them refused to pay their depositors for a time, and collected all they could. No man could borrow a dollar even by the deposit of gold or of any other security; and what the banks did private individuals did. There was a sudden loss of confidence all over the nation in banks and individuals, and that is what caused the panic. It was not any defect in the currency, but it was a want of confidence in the solvency of banks and of men engaged in business. They had a worse panic in England in 1866, when their currency was on a specie basis and above all suspicion. They had a worse panic than we have had, growing out of the failure of a great railroad house, Overend, Gurney & Co., much like our present panic.

Then, Mr. President, I desire to meet the idea that this panic was brought about by a defect in our currency; and I assume that it was not, and assuming that proposition to be incontrovertible, I will pass on a little further.

Money is scarce—made scarce by a want of confidence. It is all in the country. Men have it, but they are hoarding it; and they are hoarding paper money as it was never hoarded before, showing the confidence the people have in this currency. They are hoarding our paper money just as they hoarded gold and silver in other times. Men were willing to convert everything they could into your greenbacks, national-bank notes, and bonds. Money became scarce by the panic because it was not in circulation.

Now, sir, what is the real remedy for a panic? I ask that question, and I should like at some time for the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance to answer it. Is it by the resumption of specie payments? When before was it ever proposed as a remedy for a panic? I should like to know the single time that it was ever proposed before as a remedy for a panic. Why, sir, a suspension of specie payments has generally been the remedy—not the resumption. I call the attention of the Senate to the experience of banks and governments in every country, and I maintain the proposition that so far from resumption being regarded as a remedy for a panic, suspension has often been the remedy. In 1837, when that panic took place, the solvent banks of the country were saved only by suspending specie payments. Take a single illustration: The State Bank of Indiana, one of the best banks at that time in the country, was hard run and could not discount a dollar. The Legislature came together and authorized the banks to suspend for five years. Relief was at once obtained; the bank began to discount freely; money became plenty; and when the period for resumption came around, people seemed to have forgotten all about it.

In 1857—and my friend from Connecticut [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] will remember it well—the panic bore down with crushing force until the banks of New York and all the Eastern States, by common consent, determined to suspend, and from that time there was ease; from that time discounts became free. No, sir; suspension is the remedy for panics, and resumption is a thing for times of prosperity. That is experience.

Mr. FENTON. Let me ask the Senator from Indiana right there what is the process, what road we should pursue to reach resumption at last? He has referred to the suspensions of 1837 and 1857, and said that suspension is the remedy for panics. Now what is the road to resumption? Let me remind him that it was not until after the volume of currency was reduced forty millions from the period of suspension in 1837 and over thirty millions in 1857 that the banks resumed on those occasions.

Mr. MORTON. There was a large contraction of the currency produced by the failure of banks. I do not remember the number of banks that failed in the course of a few days in 1837, or the number that failed in a short time in 1857.

Mr. FENTON. They all suspended. They were unable to maintain specie payment because the disproportion between the volume of paper and specie was so great.

Mr. MORTON. I agree to that.

Mr. FENTON. My question is whether reduction of the volume of currency was not an essential condition to resumption again by the banks after the panics of 1837 and 1857?

Mr. MORTON. There was a large curtailment of the currency—a contraction. I understood my friend, in his speech yesterday, to lean toward contraction as the means of resuming specie payments now; but that first contraction took place by the failure of the banks and their money becoming worthless in the hands of the people; but specie payments were not resumed by the banks until the general effects of the panic had passed by, trade had been resumed, and resumption took place upon good times, and not upon bad times.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator at this moment whether at that time it was not the fact that the people were glad to get rid of that currency, instead of, as now, glad to hold on to it?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. That was the cause of the contraction.

Mr. MORTON. The effect of currency being good is sometimes a bad thing in a panic. Because in 1857 the people were suspicious of the paper of all the banks, and more anxious to pay their debts with it and get clear of it; and then if they had two or three hundred dollars left they would lend it to their neighbors and get a good note for it, preferring the note to bank paper; but now they do not do that. The currency is so good that they hoard it. There is that difference, and my friend from Michigan is correct about it.

Mr. President, I wish to refer to another thing right here, in vindication of the action of the Government, and in support of another general proposition. I lay down this as a general proposition, to be established by reference to the history of panics for the last hundred and fifty years: that the true relief for a panic, to bring about a restoration of confidence, has been, not resumption, not contraction, but by making additions to the currency at the time. That is a very important proposition, if it is true.

The remedy has been by making a small—I use the word "small"—addition to the volume of the currency at the time.

One word in regard to the action of the Government. The Government when this panic took place authorized the purchase of bonds to the amount of the currency balance in the Treasury at that time, about fourteen millions, if I remember correctly. It was said that that was taken up by the savings-banks in New York, Philadelphia, and Boston; and so it was. It was said that it was unwise, because the money did not go into circulation. It was the very wisest thing that could be done, and in my opinion prevented great mischief and circumscribed the evil effects of the panic at once.

The savings-banks of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and other cities held large amounts of United States bonds, and when they sold their bonds to the Government, as they did to the amount of about fourteen million dollars, they thereby obtained currency to pay their depositors. Their depositors knew it, had perfect confidence in them, and there was no run. I happened to be in New York at the time, and I remember well that on that Saturday, and on what was called black Sunday, there were rumors upon the streets of mobs and runs upon the savings-banks, and if it had not been that the people were assured of the solvency of those banks and of their ability to pay their deposits by the sale of their bonds to the Government and getting greenbacks for them, there would have been runs upon them, and in all probability mob violence, and the consequences of that would have been most disastrous all over the nation. The Government could have done nothing better than to have supplied those banks with currency during that time, which at once restored confidence among their depositors and prevented public disorder and violence.

Next I come to the $44,000,000 reserve. There has been some improvement in times. I hear those who are opposed to what they call inflation talking about it. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] this morning took ground against the wisdom and the propriety of the Government encroaching upon the $44,000,000 reserve. Why, sir, that very thing has contributed greatly to the restoration of confidence. The very knowledge that the currency was being enlarged, even by the addition of a few millions, has caused the banks and the people to put their money into circulation, and to cease their hoarding to a considerable extent. It is a restoration of confidence we want; and the knowledge that money is coming gives that confidence, and that knowledge causes banks and private individuals, who have money and are hoarding it, to again put it in circulation. I want to refer to history on that very point.

In 1745, when there was a great panic in England, caused by the landing of the Pretender on the shores of Scotland, how was it averted? That panic was averted by a practical suspension of specie payments, an enlarged issue of paper money immediately; and by an agreement on the part of the merchants of London and other large cities in England that they would take that paper instead of coin. Money was made plenty, the merchants were able to borrow, and the panic was stayed.

Let me come down to 1793, when the first panic in England took place, growing out of the Napoleonic wars. Mr. Pitt, a great statesman, took the responsibility of lending to the merchants of London and of Liverpool $25,000,000, (£5,000,000 sterling,) in what were called exchequer bills. He relieved their wants; he made money plenty, and stopped the panic by it. The government collected every dollar of it; lost nothing by it. It was one of the wisest responsibilities Mr. Pitt ever took. He could do, as prime minister of England, without law, what the President of the United States cannot do under our form of government. He lent that money without authority of law, put $25,000,000 additional in circulation, and stopped the panic; and in 1797, four years afterward, when the second panic began, because they were still in war and that war was being enlarged in its area and magnitude, the ministry took the responsibility of compelling the Bank of England to suspend specie payments; and that action was confirmed by an act of Parliament; and the suspension lasted twenty-one years. It was twenty-one years before they were in a condition to resume specie payments; and just as soon as the bank suspended, and was relieved from the necessity of redeeming her notes in coin, she commenced her discounts and issued a large addition of paper money. The volume of the currency was increased; and according to the historian of the Bank of England, who gives a very graphic account of it, money that had been hoarded by bankers, private banks, merchants, and retired capitalists, immediately came forth and was emptied into the general volume of circulation; and not only the money issued by the bank, but all the money that had been hidden away, was called into active circulation, and the panic was at an end.

The same thing was done in 1816. In 1816 there was another panic, and there were two thousand bankruptcies. How was it relieved? By the government giving the Bank of England five years longer, by act of Parliament, to resume specie payments. Then her notes had risen until they were at only 2½ per cent. discount. Now our Government notes are at 10 per cent. discount. But the British government gave the Bank of England five years to overcome the 2½ per cent. She overcame the 2½ per cent. in three years—did not take the five; but no sooner had specie payments been resumed than a terrible crash came on; and one of the greatest financial disasters the people of England ever suffered occurred immediately after the resumption of specie payments in 1819.

To come further down, in 1825 there was another panic. Specie payments had been resumed; the Bank of England had been paying specie for her notes ever since 1819. How was that panic relieved? There was no actual suspension at that time, but it so happened that the Bank of England found in her vaults £1,000,000 sterling, in £1 notes, in an old box that seemed to have been forgotten; and those notes being brought out and put in circulation, it is said to have had the effect to stay the panic.

Next, in 1826, a crisis again threatened. A large amount of money was issued by the Bank of England by increasing her discounts. Now we come down to 1844. The Parliament passed what was called the bank charter, reorganized the Bank of England, and made two departments in the bank—what was called the banking department for discounts, and what was called the issue department, the department where they made the bank paper and issued it over to the other department; and they provided that the bank should have authority to issue £14,000,000 upon the basis of what the government owed her—the government owed her about eleven millions sterling—and three millions in addition upon paper securities, including exchequer bills, making fourteen millions. That was all the Bank of England had a right to issue under that charter—with this further provision, that whenever the bank issued beyond the fourteen millions sterling she must have a pound sterling of bullion in her vaults for every pound note of paper money that was put out.

Then, in 1847, came that dreadful panic, most memorable since that of 1797; and see how the bank was situated. She had at that time in her vaults over eight million pounds sterling of bullion, or forty million dollars of gold, in what was called the issue department of the bank. What was the relief for the panic? The government took the responsibility of suspending the charter of the bank. They suspended the charter, and in open violation of the law they authorized the transfer of the eight million pounds sterling from the issue department of the bank to the discount department of the bank, thereby enabling the bank to increase the circulation to the amount of forty million dollars of paper. What was the effect of it? Just as soon as the country knew that the bank was authorized to increase her discounts forty millions the panic was stayed. It took place almost in a single day. Of the $40,000,000 that the bank was authorized to issue only £400,000 were actually asked for. Confidence was at once restored by the knowledge that the bank was authorized to increase the circulation.

We come down to 1857. There was another panic in England then. How was it stayed? Did they say, like our philosophers do here, that a panic must run its course? Our financial philosophers say we must let a panic alone; it must run its course like the measles, or the small-pox, or a fever; you must not doctor it any. They never take that view of it in England. From the first they have proceeded upon the principle of doctoring a panic—of trying to stop it at once. You might just as well say that when a fire breaks out in a great city like Chicago you must let it alone, let it run its course, not try to put it out or circumscribe it by blowing up buildings all around it; or when the yellow fever breaks out at Memphis you must not strive to hem in the pestilence and stamp it out; let it run its course. I say when a panic occurs it is the duty of the Government, if possible, to stay its progress and shorten its duration. If we can shorten its duration six months we confer a vast blessing upon the country. Every day it continues millions are lost in productive labor and the profits of business, and there is vast suffering and distress; and if you shorten it but one month you have conferred an inestimable favor upon the people.

The English government, the French and German governments, have always gone upon the theory, not of letting panics run their course, but of trying to relieve them, shorten their continuance, remove their consequences as soon as possible. When the panic of 1857 took place the English government again took the responsibility of suspending the bank act and allowing the bank to issue money beyond her legal limits—in other words, to increase the volume of paper circulation; and as soon as that fact was known it had the effect of staying the panic, and but two million pounds sterling, or ten million dollars, were required.

Again, in 1866, when the great panic occasioned by the failure of Overend, Gurney & Co. took place, when the currency of England was as perfect as the currency of any country could be, what course did the English government take? The same that had been taken ever since 1745—they relieved the panic by authorizing the bank to make an addition to her circulation, and the effect was instantaneous.

In 1848, when a panic in France was caused by the revolution, the provisional government, to allay it, authorized the Bank of France to issue additional currency sufficient for the exigency, limiting its entire issue to 350,000,000 francs, or $70,000,000.

Then I say that the proposition that panics are not to run their course, but are to be doctored and relieved, is sustained by the history of panics for many years in the past, and the way that has been adopted has been either by suspending specie payments generally or making an addition to the volume of the currency. When a panic takes place it does not require a very large addition to the currency, to restore confidence and bring about a revival of trade and commerce. I am opposed to expansion. I do not believe in the doctrine of adding one hundred or two hundred or three hundred millions to the currency. I would do no such thing; but I do believe in resorting to those easy, natural, and often proved to be efficacious means of relieving the effects of a panic by making money plenty for the time being. Money is scarce because people hoard it. How do you make it plenty? Add a little to the whole volume of the currency, and that calls out what has been hoarded. That has been the experience and history of England and France and Germany. And when the panic has been relieved and good times have come you can take it back; to use a sailor's phrase, you can "take in the slack" if you desire to do so. If you think the volume of currency is too great you can fund it, as my friend, the chairman of the committee, proposes to do. There are various ways in which you can get that money back.

It does not take much to start the wheels, but when the wheels of trade are started their revolution becomes faster and faster. If any of you traveled in the West in former times you have sometimes seen a wagon stuck in the mud, and when they put on a fifth horse—a little more power—and got a single revolution of the wheels, they could pull out easily, and the additional horse could be taken off. I remember when I was a very little boy—it is about as long ago as I can remember anything—going to mill, and the mill was not running because the water was low; and I remember that the miller and his boys went to the race below, with buckets, and took water out of the race and carried it up over the overshot wheel, and when they lifted the head-gate poured the water on from the buckets, and the wheel started, slowly at first, but finally turned faster, and the grist was ground out. I doubt not, Mr. President, you have seen an old pump that had gone dry; you would pour a quart of water in the top; the circulation would be started, and the pump would resume, and you could pump water all day.

Mr. President, instead of following theory in a matter of this kind, let us follow rather the lights of experience. And now what is being done by the Treasury Department? Acting on that principle—whether they are doing it for that purpose or not, that is what they are doing. The Government is to-day, by the disbursement of the $44,000,000 reserve, adding to the volume of the currency; and those small additions which are being made, of which the whole country is aware, are doing much to-day toward removing the effect of this panic. So that this falling off in the revenue, while it is a great misfortune, is not an unmixed one; it is carrying some benefit to the people. The Government is not responsible for this panic. Why, sir, this panic was an accident, just as much as the explosion of the boiler of a steamboat, or a collision upon a railroad—an accident, the result of an event that nobody could foresee. It had no connection with our Government system of finance or anything in our currency. It was an accident that might have happened just as well in a country that had nothing but gold and silver as a currency. It was an accident; and shall not relief be provided for this accident? Our Government is now relieving against it. I was very sorry when the panic commenced that our Government did not see its way clear to put into circulation at once the whole $44,000,000 reserve. I believe if the Government had been able to do that, this panic would have stopped at once; it would not have lasted three weeks; but the President was not at liberty to do that, the Secretary of the Treasury did not feel safe in doing that. Why? He anticipated, and with a sagacity that he, perhaps, has not got credit for—he anticipated, as did the President, that there might be a falling off in the revenues, and that that falling off would require this $44,000,000 reserve to carry on the ordinary operations of the Government; and those anticipations have turned out to be correct to the very letter.

Is it said that there is no panic. I give you evidence of the existence of a panic, of its wide-spread and disastrous character, and that is in the falling off of the revenues. There is proof positive. Your imports have fallen off very largely. The very day the panic occurred, or the day after, men who had sent large orders to Europe for goods recalled them by telegraph. I know that that was done. Our imports have fallen off largely, and therefore our receipts of gold for duties have fallen off largely; and our internal revenues also have fallen off largely. These are the effects of the panic; and the best way to restore the revenue is to restore the condition of the country, and you cannot do it until you do restore the condition of the country.

As I said before, the Government is no more responsible for this panic than anybody in private life. It was a thing that could not have been anticipated, and that might happen in any government and under any system of finance that the ingenuity of man ever devised. But the accident came; the consequences are upon us.

But, Mr. President, I have said five times as much as I expected to say when I began. I was rather drawn into this line of remark by my friend from Massachusetts. I desire to say again, that while I agree that we are bound at some time to come to the specie standard and that we are bound by the most solemn pledge to redeem our notes in coin, or by giving the holders, at their option, an equivalent, I do not believe this is the time to undertake to do it or to enter upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] to the resolution.

Mr. BOGY. If it is the good will of the Senate at this time to give me their attention I will detain them for a few moments to give expression to my views, and, I might say, the views of my section, upon the very important question now before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Learning that the Senator from Missouri would rather proceed to-morrow than to-day, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is rather an early hour of the day. Unless the Senator from Missouri desires a postponement I hope he will go on for a while longer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw all objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and eight minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 795) making an appropriation to pay the salaries of the official reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a resolution that when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, the 19th instant, they shall stand adjourned until Monday, the 5th of January next, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message also announced that the House had passed a resolution instructing the Congressional Printer to furnish to each Senator and to each Member of and Delegate in the House of Representatives twenty-four copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or of any such other like official report of the debates in Congress as may be hereafter authorized by law, either daily as originally published or in the revised form, without binding, or in bound volumes, or part in each form, as each Member and Delegate may elect.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 481) making appropriations for extraordinary expenses of the naval service.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 481) making appropriations for extraordinary expenses of the naval service; and

A bill (H. R. No. 482) to correct the enrollment of an act entitled "An act for the relief of P. W. Standefer."

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 795) making an appropriation to pay the salaries of the official reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that had better only have one reading to-day. I object to its second reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go on the table.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was read:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, the 19th instant, they shall stand adjourned until Monday, the 5th day of January next.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to a point of order. The doors are not yet opened. All of the doors that communicate with the public of the United States are still closed. I want to have the order of the Senate executed that the doors be opened before we proceed to business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will open the doors of the Senate. He has been ordered to do so before.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the order executed first.

Mr. SHERMAN. The doors are open. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. THURMAN. Is the resolution before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nothing is in order until the doors are opened. The Chair will await a report from the Sergeant-at-Arms that the order has been executed. [After a pause.] The Chair announces to the Senate that all the doors are open.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say a word on this resolution if it is before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending question? Is there any question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is, What disposition will the Senate make of the resolution of the House of Representatives?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has it been read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought the Clerk had not read it half through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been laid before the Senate and read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have we taken it up for consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, What disposition will the Senate make of the resolution which the Chair has laid before the Senate and which the Secretary has read?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has it been laid before the Senate to-day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to its present consideration.

Mr. SARGENT, (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the rule of lying over one day apply to a resolution to adjourn?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It most certainly does to a resolution that we adjourn for an extensive time, and not simply adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution has been laid before the Senate by the Chair and has been read. The question now is, What disposition will the Senate make of the resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to a point of order, and object, under the rules, that the resolution cannot be considered to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair informs the Senator that this is not a resolution of the Senate, but is a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. I renew my motion to adjourn. That is always in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. THURMAN. Can I be taken off the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. The Chair will wait until Senators resume their seats. It is impossible for a young Chairman to hear twenty men at once. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENSON. I rise to a point of order. The point of order is that the Senator nearest to the outside circle [Mr. THURMAN] was on the floor when the other Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] moved an adjournment. Therefore the Senator from Ohio who made the motion to adjourn had the floor to make it.

Mr. SHERMAN. My colleague had yielded to the Senator from Vermont, who raised a point of order; and the Chair decided the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] the Chair understood, was in his seat when the other Senator moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator had not been recognized at all. He made his proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move, then——

Mr. THURMAN. Who is to settle this matter?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland will state his point of order.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. My point of order is this: the honorable Senator from Vermont wanted to know from the Chair what disposition was to be made of the proposition, and said that if it were in order to do so he would object to its consideration to-day if that would carry it over until to-morrow. The Chair was deliberating or examining into that question for the purpose of giving an opinion, and we want that opinion before any other measure can intervene.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair ruled the consideration of the resolution to be in order at that point of the proceedings.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. No exception can be taken; the resolution can be considered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The trouble with the Senator's proposition is this: that after the Chair had ruled that that proceeding was in order the Senator from Ohio moved that the Senate do now adjourn, which is the pending question.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will come up in order to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 20, noes 28.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the Senator will withdraw that call.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Cragin, Crozier, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Hitchcock, Howe, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Pratt, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Thurman, West, and Wright—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ramsey, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Stockton, Wadleigh, and Windom—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Brownlow, Cameron, Conkling, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Jones, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Robertson, Schurz, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, and Tipton—23.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Now I move to proceed to the consideration of the resolution received from the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont will state his point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I insist upon it that under the rules of the Senate, and particularly Rule 26, this resolution, coming from the House of Representatives to us to-day, cannot be considered on this day without unanimous consent. If it had been introduced here, we all agree that it could not have been considered without unanimous consent. Now, the idea that we are forced to consider, without notice and without any time for reflection, a resolution from the House of Representatives, without its lying over a day, when by our rules we provide that we cannot consider one of our own resolutions, is, of course, perfectly absurd. I submit that under the twenty-sixth rule, all other resolutions than those that are named in it must lie over one day for consideration, unless, of course, unanimous consent be given to their being taken up. Therefore, I respectfully resubmit the point of order that I made to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The language of the rule is:

> And all resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution, or to which the approbation and signature of the President may be requisite, or which may grant money out of the contingent or any other fund, shall be treated, in all respects, in the introduction and form of proceeding on them, in the Senate, in a similar manner with bills and all other resolutions—

Which must mean all other Senate resolutions—> shall lie on the table one day for consideration; and also reports of committees.

Meaning, as the Chair thinks, resolutions introduced in the Senate, and, of course, reports of committees in the Senate. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order, and decides that the resolution, having been laid before the Senate, must now be disposed of by the Senate in some way, either by reference, or passage, or otherwise.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have been voting in such strange company on this question for a few days that I feel very much like rising to explain, but I will not take up the time of the Senate, when Senators want to go home, with anything of an explanation, except to say that I believe, if this resolution should be amended so as to provide for an adjournment from next Tuesday, it is quite possible it might command a majority of the Senate; but I do hope that we shall not adjourn to-morrow.

I think it is proper for me to say to the Senate that I believe the Committee on the Judiciary will report upon the bankrupt law to-morrow, and that we shall make such a report as I firmly believe will command the assent of a majority, and perhaps the unanimous assent of the Senate. At least, I hope so; I believe so; and, if we do, then that bill which we shall introduce can become the law of the land, provided we do not adjourn to-morrow; but, if we are to adjourn to-morrow evening, it is perfectly manifest that it cannot become the law of the land.

Under these circumstances, it does seem to me that, merely for the convenience of Senators and Members of the House, for us to adjourn to-morrow, when, by sitting a few days longer, we can dispose of this great subject, with reference to which hundreds of petitions are lying upon our tables, will be a course that will be condemned by our constituents, and that we could not, upon reflection, commend ourselves.

It is for these reasons, because I want this measure acted upon if no other should be acted upon, and because I believe the results of the labors of your committee will be such that the Senate will approve of them, and that what they propose can become the law of the land if we sit until next Monday night, that I am opposed to this resolution. I have great respect for those who think otherwise. No man is more disposed to defer to the opinions of others than I am, and it pains me always to differ in opinion with those with whom I am accustomed to act, and for whose opinions I entertain such unfeigned respect; but in view of what I know to be not merely the feeling of the country, but the necessity for immediate action, I cannot let a law remain on the statute-book which every day is used as an instrument of blackmailing and destroying men who are worth twice as much as they owe, when by sitting here a few days longer the proper remedy can be applied.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. One word. Let us talk about this matter reasonably. The honorable Senator from Ohio says the report of the Committee on the Judiciary is to be here to-morrow. That is his belief only. Then it is to be printed. We are to have it before us the next day, that is Saturday, if we are to have it at all; and all the probabilities are that we shall adjourn from Friday until Monday.

Several SENATORS. No, no.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Gentlemen say "No, no." So far as my vote is concerned, I say "Yes, yes."

Mr. EDMUNDS. You cannot vote twice. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The honorable Senator voted three times upon the question, and I voted but twice. [Laughter.] I repeat, the probabilities are that we shall adjourn from Friday until Monday. Then we are approaching Christmas. Now here is an important proposition like the bankrupt law; and we are to pass upon that in one day. I tell the honorable Senator from Ohio that that cannot be done. The debating talent of this Senate will never permit that to be done. [Laughter.] The debating talent of the Senate did permit the increase of salaries to pass last winter in one day. I remember that well. But the bankrupt bill never will, nor any other bill, from an eclipse of the sun to the closing up of the barber shops on Sunday, in this body. [Laughter.]

Why did not the honorable Senator know something about the bankrupt bill when we met at the beginning of this session? Where were these petitions then? He heard of them in the canvass in Ohio probably. We have heard of them before. I assure the honorable Senator that I will vote for the repeal of the bankrupt law; and if I cannot get an unconditional repeal, with qualifications to save pending suits, I will vote for the best amendments to the law. I am with the Senator on that point.

But let us be reasonable and sensible about this matter. Suppose we remain here until Monday or Tuesday; what then? Are we to adjourn over then until after the 1st of January? Will we do that? What becomes of the bankrupt bill? Will you pass it in a day? Try it at once, and you will see. I may be mistaken, but I do not hesitate to make the assertion here on my individual responsibility that we cannot pass that bill, with the number of lawyers there are in this body, in one day. Besides, the President is away, and the bill cannot become a law.

If we adjourn over for the holidays, we can read the amendments in the mean time, and I assure my honorable friend that I will read his amendments and report in the mean time, and come back here and give them a fair and honest consideration, and in all probability go with him.

All peoples have their holidays; and why should we be separated from our families at Christmas time? Those gentlemen who have their families here can well afford to remain here. Indeed, the fact is, that we ought not to meet until after the holidays; that is the truth of the matter, and we ought to change our day of meeting. There is not a Legislature in the Union that meets about the holidays or before the holidays, but all our legislative bodies meet in January. Some of them used to meet in December, but they have changed, in order that they may have the advantage of their holidays in their own domestic circle at home.

Why not take this usual recess this year? We can come back after the new year opens better prepared to transact business, and better prepared to act on the bankrupt law in all its various phases. I beg the honorable Senator to consider that we will do what is right, and, so far as I am concerned, I can assure him that I shall not open my mouth in respect to the bankrupt law, but shall vote for its repeal, or for whatever the exigency may require in regard to it.

Mr. THURMAN. I rise only to answer a question that is personal to myself, and which will take but a moment. The honorable Senator from Maryland asks me where was the Senator from Ohio at the beginning of this session; why did he not urge the repeal of this bankrupt law then. I can tell the Senator that if he knew what has been done in the Judiciary Committee of this body he would know that from the first day that committee was formed down to this time the Senator from Ohio has been urging this subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And I can add upon that subject, in justification of my honorable friend from Ohio, (of whom I may say with entire good faith that if we are to be cursed with a democratic President, I hope it will be he,) that the Judiciary Committee has been busy every day during the session of the Senate and by a technical violation of its rules in attending to the business that you have commanded us to do, business of high importance. Therefore, I must say that the suggestion of my friend from Maryland to my friend from Ohio is one which has no place in this question. We have been constant, "in season and out of season," in endeavoring to perform the duties that you have imposed upon us. We have neither slept nor rested—speaking in a broad sense, not literally of course—night or morning, in endeavoring to do the important duties that you have intrusted to us, and in respect to which you have a right to demand of us that we shall know the firm ground upon which we are treading and that you shall know it too. It comes, therefore, with rather an ill grace from those who are disposed to criticise the conduct of this Administration and of this Congress to complain of this committee that it is not able, like the Almighty, to do everything at once and to do it well.

But I know, Mr. President, the temptation of the terrapin of the Chesapeake Bay. Considerations of public necessity, the necessities of the public service, I know, become rather pale when the terrapin and the canvas-back come in about the latter days of December. I feel the force of that argument myself. I am fond of that sort of drink (if you call it that) on the western shore of the bay myself. But I submit to my honorable friend from Maryland that there is no ground, in all seriousness, to taunt the Judiciary Committee or any member of the committee with having failed for a moment to exert all his energies to carry out the will of the Senate and to report upon matters that have been confided to it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Just one word, if the honorable Senator will allow me. I surely do not undertake to impugn in any respect the conduct or the action of the committee, for I know that the gentlemen upon it are industrious in all matters before them; and I will suggest to the honorable Senator, as he has mentioned the severe labors they have endured, that probably a little recess may be of advantage to that committee. [Laughter.] That is an argument for it rather than against it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will be time enough to consider that when we ask it, sick and ill as some of us are, and embarrassed by other duties in the other committees, as many of us are, which have been made to yield to the duties of this committee all the time. It will be time enough to adjourn over for our benefit when we put in a petition of that kind.

We have undertaken to report to the Senate, if it were possible with human ingenuity, if we could agree upon anything, certain modifications of the bankrupt law, or to report for its repeal or maintenance as it is, according to what we may believe to be the just rights of all classes, debtors and creditors, and for the general public good in every part of the Republic. In order to do that, and to do it as my friend from Ohio has stated we have good reason to believe we can do it, to preserve the beneficent provisions of this act and to dispense with those which have been abused, or to put them in a condition where they cannot be abused, we shall be able to report by to-morrow, as I really trust and believe we can, something which ought to command—not upon a preconceived determination that we will vote this way or that way, as the Senator from Maryland seems to say, but reporting to our peers representing the country and the States a state of considerations which shall invite their calm deliberation and their judgment formed after the report and not before it, and which shall command the general approval of this body.

I do not mean to impute to my honorable friend from Maryland the idea that he has determined that he will vote this way or that on this important question as it may be presented; he does not know how. I know he would not do that; but the remarks which he has made might lead people who did not know him so well as I do to imagine that he had foreclosed this subject, and, being a judge in whose hands the welfare of the people is, he had determined in advance of the hearing of the cause that he would decide it this way or the other. He has not. I know he has not. If we can give him good reasons, although he is now inclined to the entire repeal of this act as his present impression, he will be open to its modification in order to protect the rights of all parties and preserve its beneficence for all, if he can. I am sure he has not denied himself the right of considering the report we may make upon the facts and the merits that we may present. I know he has not, because I know him; but he might be misunderstood.

Now, sir, shall we foreclose a fair deliberation upon this subject and upon others of importance, by determining now that we shall adjourn the day after to-morrow or Monday? We ought not by any means. In order that those who doubt what the public good requires may consider what we report, in order that there may be discussion, which we know does, be it tedious and tiresome as it may, elucidate the truth even from the dullest orators, of whom I count myself chief, and does good; in order that these discussions shall go on, we ought, if our constituents are interested in this bankrupt question, as they are everywhere, devote, and devote now if we may, even at our own personal inconvenience, sufficient time to the serious consideration of the proposals that may be made, that we may go home to the country and say that we have carefully and deliberately considered what has been proposed, and that, for reasons which we can explain and make plain to everybody, we have decided to do this or do that.

Now, what is the result if you adopt this resolution? We are forced into a certain compass of time; we are foreclosed from free deliberation. If I undertook to explain why the law should not be repealed altogether, and that the greatest interests of all demand its continuance in a modified and restricted form, you do not listen to me; you are in a hurry; you cannot wait; the time is running; the time is fixed when my voice must be silenced, and if I go too far—ten minutes, or fifteen, or twenty—then it is immediately imputed to us—not below the galleries of course, because we are all honorable men here, but above the line of the galleries it is imputed to us—that I am talking against time and that the time is running out and is fixed, and that I am going to kill this beneficent modification of the bankrupt law by talking it to death. So with any other Senator upon either side.

Mr. President, that is not right. If it be true that the present condition of the country requires either the repeal or modification of this law so as to prevent abuses that have been suggested, then it follows necessarily that it is always true that this Senate is bound to stay here to consider calmly and deliberately, without a limit of time which threatens us every moment, the provisions that we are to make.

I acknowledge the sincerity of my friend from Maryland in his wish to go home; but I do hope that he will forego his pressure at this moment until the Senate can see what it may be that we shall propose, as I believe, to-morrow; and then the Senate can determine whether it is not better to pass the measure that we propose, which we hope will satisfy everybody, than it is to run headlong on preconceived resolution either for the repeal or for the retention of the act as it stands.

I do not wish to occupy time at this hour of the day, and I find that I have not the ability to occupy it any longer. I should hope that the Senate would not fix the time for adjournment over the holidays, laying aside all other questions which might affect us until we should be able to see what should be done about this matter. I am sure my friend from Maryland will understand me as saying nothing impugning his motives or the good faith of his motives.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The Senator says we should wait and see; but the holidays are right upon us. We have Saturday and Sunday, and then come the holidays. Therefore we have no time for consideration; they are right upon us now. Unless we determine now it will be too late.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well, Mr. President; if the people of this country require this measure of tolerance and security let the holidays wait for us, if that is our public duty. If, on the other hand, it appears that there is no pressure about this public affair and the others that were named yesterday, then the holidays are a very jolly thing for the terrapin and the canvas-back.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, the business which seems to have filled the mind of the country, and which has finally been sent to us from the House of Representatives, as the most important measure yet claiming public attention, has been sent to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and I think it would be but fair that it should be accompanied by this resolution fixing the time for adjournment. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 21, and the noes 24.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPENCER, (at five o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CHANDLER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. NORWOOD.] He if present would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on this motion.

Mr. SCOTT. I was requested to state that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.] Mr. SHERMAN would vote "yea" and Mr. RANSOM "nay."

Mr. WRIGHT. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON.] If he were present he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. On all questions relating to adjournment over the holidays I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] He would vote in favor of it if here, and I against it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Cragin, Crozier, Edmunds, Gilbert, Hitchcock, Howe, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Pratt, Sargent, Scott, Spencer, Thurman, and West—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Stockton, Wadleigh, and Windom—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Cameron, Conkling, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Jones, Kelly, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Ransom, Robertson, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, and Wright—28.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I move that the resolution be adopted.

Mr. CHANDLER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on another question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the resolution be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment? on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I thought that was decided.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, as it seems that this night has been set apart for speeches more than any other kind of business, I propose to say a few words, although I do not feel inclined to talk just now.

The scene before us reminds me of days in the past. When responsibilities are to be taken—and I hope the Senate will pardon me for this allusion—it is not necessary that the minority of the House or of the Senate should be responsible for anything, nor are they responsible before the country. The responsibility always rests upon the majority. Were I in the position of my friend from Maryland, wanting to go home and have a pleasant time during the holidays, although he lives not very far from here, I would do just as he is doing, for the reason that he and his associates on that side of the chamber are not responsible for the legislation of Congress. I am glad to find that we have one recruit on that side, who looks upon it as more important to the country that some legislation should be had in a certain direction than that we should have roast turkey and fine duck for a Christmas dinner. I notice, and I am sorry to notice it, that we are more inclined to generosity on this side of the Chamber, especially when we approach the holidays.

Now, sir, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary states to the Senate that that committee is prepared to report on a very important measure, one of the most important measures, to a great many people in this country, that will be acted upon during this session of Congress. He tells us that he is prepared to report on a bill repealing or modifying a measure that is being used as a means of oppression to grind the debtor class all over the country. In view of that statement, I ask whether or not the party in the majority in this Senate Chamber can take it upon themselves, merely for the sake of a little pleasure during a few days, to postpone action for sixteen or eighteen days?

I know the bankrupt bill is not a measure that comes up in a party sense, but it has this effect before the country, for we are held responsible. And in a great crisis like this, when the whole country is trembling upon the very verge of ruin, the majority here in Congress stand trifling with the great interests of the country, and are willing that they should be sacrificed, although they are the agents and representatives of the Government, merely that they may have a day or two of pleasure. I appeal to Senators in this Chamber whether they are willing to trifle with the great interests of the people of this country in this manner.

The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and I compliment him for it, appealed to his own friends, and to this side of the Chamber too, to amend this resolution by postponing the adjournment until Tuesday, in order that action might be had upon this all-important measure; but even that cannot be granted. Two days out of eighteen cannot be devoted to that labor by the dignified gentlemen who represent the people of this country. We cannot give two days; our time is too precious; our pleasure is too much to us for us to sacrifice two days in order to legislate for the people whom we represent.

I do not wonder that the people of the whole country, from one end to the other, have been complaining of us; and I put myself in. I take my full share of the responsibility with others. I do not wonder that the people have complained of us. I do not wonder that Congress has been denounced. I do not wonder that the people are getting somewhat tired of the manner in which we devote our time and attention to legislation, when we are sent here for the purpose of legislating in reference to their interests. It is because of the fact that we do not take the interest in legislation that we ought to do; we do not feel the interest that we ought. We are willing to lay aside all the measures before us and go home, and come back eighteen days from now and take them up where we left off, no matter how much the interests of the country may suffer in the mean time. While this crisis is upon the country; while the financial interests of the country are in their present condition; while the people are appealing to us to protect them from bankruptcy by doing something in reference to the bankrupt law—not that we may prevent men from collecting their debts, but to prevent men from being robbed and destroyed—I ask Senators whether they do not feel that it is their duty to stay here at least until the Committee on the Judiciary can make a report to the Senate, and we attempt at any rate to take action on the subject?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator from Illinois. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has expressed it as his belief only that they will be able to report to-morrow. Now, we know that this is a very important subject. The bill has just been referred to that committee, composed, as we all know, of able lawyers, and they will have their differing views on the subject, and they will desire to perfect that bill. The chairman himself has simply said that he believed they might make a report—not that they would do so—to-morrow.

Mr. LOGAN. I have conversed with the committee on the subject, for I feel about as much interest in it, perhaps, as any one else on behalf of my constituents. The committee have had the subject before them ever since the first day of the session; for the first act of mine in the Senate of the United States at the present session was to introduce a bill, and on the very first day of the session, for the repeal of the bankrupt act, which I had referred to that committee as soon as it was organized. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] on the very same day introduced a bill for the repeal of a portion of the bankrupt law, and both bills were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary as soon as it was organized. The President's message also recommended some modification of the law, and called the attention of Congress to it; and that, too, was referred to the committee. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] introduced a bill of a similar character. The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] also introduced a bill of a similar character. Hence the matter has been before the Committee on the Judiciary from the commencement of the session, and it has been pressed upon their attention by appeals from all parts of the country.

And yet we are acting as though we were playing with the great interests of the country; as though there was no responsibility on the majority of the Senate; for I do not find fault with the minority of the Senate. They are not to blame. It is to their interest, if they can, to delay action here—not to injure the country—for they lose nothing and we lose all, so far as political matters are concerned. I do not mean to say that they would do so for that purpose; but having the desire to do what they want to do in reference to these holidays, they have no responsibility, and hence they can afford to do it much better than we can. I do not know that the constituents of other Senators are in the same condition, but I do know that appeals are coming to me from all parts of my State begging that I, at least, and the Representatives of that State, will urge this matter prior to the adjournment for the holidays.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. I should like to ask the Senator whether he himself is prepared to vote for the total repeal of that law, or whether he would prefer to take the plan of the President and repeal only the involuntary clause of it? I will inquire further, if he will permit me, whether he knows that his constituency want a total repeal or not?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know what all my constituency want; but I will answer the Senator very frankly: I am prepared to vote for the total repeal of the bankrupt act. Why? Because I do not agree with the principle of the bankrupt law. I do not know that the majority of the Senate or any great portion of the Senate will agree with me; but the fact that I am prepared to vote for the total repeal of the bankrupt law is no reason why I would not modify my opinions in accordance with the opinions of the majority of the Senate to get the best thing we can from the bankrupt law. The question is not whether I shall vote for the total repeal or whether I shall vote for a modification. That is not the question before the country and the question the people are interested in. The people of the country who stand upon the verge of ruin—many of whom are about being put into bankruptcy, who, as the Senator from Ohio said, are able to pay two dollars for every one that they owe—want to know what Congress is going to do in this respect before its adjournment. The people of this country want to understand what we intend to do, whether we propose to repeal the law or to relieve them by repealing portions of it, whether we will repeal the involuntary clause of the law, or whether we will modify it, so that advantage may not be taken of men by oppressors for the purpose of destroying them in their private property. That is what the country asks of us; that is what the country wants. If we cannot afford to remain here two or three days for the purpose of deciding that question, I, for one, say that, in my judgment, we are not performing the duty which the people imposed upon us when they elected us to this honorable body.

I feel particularly interested in this subject, because I live in a large city where constant appeals are made to me, and where I know of many cases of men who are wealthy being ruined by having petitions brought against them to put them into bankruptcy. For that reason I desire to stay here until at least we take some action on this subject, although my family is not here. I have as great a desire to leave this place for a few days as any Senator, if I could do it with propriety, but I do not feel that I can do so; and hence I am opposed to this resolution.

Mr. WEST. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, a division was called for, which resulted—ayes 19, noes 21.

Mr. WEST. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STOCKTON. I shall occupy the time of the Senate but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is not debatable.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. NORWOOD.] If he were present he would vote nay and I should vote yea.

Mr. WINDOM. I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.] If he were present he would vote yea and I should vote nay.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Cragin, Crozier, Edmunds, Gilbert, Hitchcock, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Sargent, Scott, Spencer, Thurman, Wadleigh, and West—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Merrimon, Ramsey, Saulsbury, and Stockton—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Cameron, Conkling, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ransom, Robertson, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Windom, and Wright—32.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock and eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 18, 1873.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to correct the Journal. The Journal states that during the progress of the proceedings yesterday a motion was made to lay the salary bill on the table. I submit that no such motion was made.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected accordingly.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask unanimous consent of the House, for the first time in my congressional life, to be indulged for a very few minutes on a matter personal to myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, during the debate of yesterday upon the salary bill an amendment to that bill was offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON,] which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read, together with the question and answer following it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That if any member of this House has received fees from the United States since the 4th of March last, pursuant to an act entitled "An act to authorize the continued employment of an agent and counsel of the United States," approved March 3, 1873, the amount thereof shall be deducted from his salary as a member of the Forty-third Congress; and if such fees have not yet been paid the payment thereof, either directly or indirectly, is hereby prohibited.

Mr. SPEER. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to state whom that amendment would hit?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. That would not be a part of the amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPEER. The House ought to know.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, the question what gentleman was to be hit by that amendment was doubtless a pertinent question. It was evident that some member of this House, one member, and one member only, was to be hit.

Probably a majority of the members of this House may have no knowledge as to who that member was; but the few who do happen to know that I was the only person referred to in the gentleman's amendment know that it was intended for me. It was intended to foist upon the records of this House and upon the debates reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a stigma upon me—a deliberate and planned insult; and as such I accept it.

In the summer of 1871 I was employed, under the direction of the President of the United States, by the Secretary of State as the agent and counsel of the United States before the mixed commission provided for by the treaty of Washington to represent the United States before that commission, and to defend it against the claims preferred by British subjects. I entered upon the duties of that employment. Those duties were professional purely. I stood there as the counsel and attorney of the United States. I continued in that employment down to March, 1873.

In the fall of 1872, while acting in this employment, I was elected a member of this House. Shortly after my election, and before the time for my term of office as Representative to commence, I called the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that by the statute of 1808, as construed by a decision rendered some years ago by the Attorney-General of the United States, I could not, after my term of office commenced as a Representative in Congress, whether sworn in or not, continue to act in a professional relation to the United States, that being held to be a contract within the meaning of the statute of 1808. The Secretary expressed a desire that I should remain in charge of those cases, assigning the reason that the cases were numerous, large, and important; that in the year and a half that I had been engaged in them of course I had become far more familiar with them, and by that experience better enabled to conduct the defense in the future than a new man would be even of far superior ability. I said that if I remained it could only be by an act of Congress removing the disability imposed by the act of 1808. He—the Secretary of State and not I—asked Congress to pass an act removing that disability. It was passed unanimously by both Houses of Congress, and simply provided that, notwithstanding the disqualifying provisions of the act of 1808, the President might, in his discretion, continue to employ the present agent and counsel for the United States notwithstanding his election to Congress, until he should take the oath of office as a Representative.

Under that act I continued to act until the close of the commission and until the end of the month of November last. It is not, of course, for me to say how well or how ill I conducted that business. I can only say that for two years and more I served the Government faithfully and diligently to the best of my ability. If there is anything in these facts which authorizes any gentleman in this House to attempt to fix a stigma upon me, to provide by an unconstitutional provision, as the gentleman knew it to be, that my salary as a member of this House should be disallowed to the amount of my compensation as counsel, I am glad to learn it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE, of New York. In a very few minutes, if the gentleman will wait.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I wish to ask a question upon the subject upon which the gentleman is now speaking.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Go on; propound.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not cast any stigma upon the gentleman, or any imputation whatever. But I listened attentively to his speech on the day before yesterday, wherein he stated, as I now recollect, that the salary provided for members of Congress was quite too large, and he advocated the repeal of the act fixing that salary on that ground. I wish to know of the gentleman whether during the time of his professional services for the United States he did not receive much more than members of Congress received, even if they get $7,500 a year?

Mr. HALE, of New York. The question of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] is simply impertinent, and as such I decline to answer it. If he desires to know how much I received in my professional capacity from those from whom I might lawfully take it, he can ascertain by making proper inquiry.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I thought something the gentleman said day before yesterday was impertinent.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do not yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to ask the gentleman a question which I think the gentleman will not consider impertinent; at least it is not so intended.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Go on.

Mr. RANDALL. In my mind the gentleman has not touched the objection which was intended to be provided against by the act of 1808, as construed by the Attorney-General. The point is this: was not the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] a recipient of fees from the Government of the United States, at the same time that he monthly drew pay as a member of Congress?

Mr. HALE, of New York. Certainly I was; and I certainly expected to be.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman think that was morally right?

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman will allow me to answer his question. I did it under the authority of an act of Congress, properly and legally, precisely as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] and the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON,] take fees from their clients while they are members of Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. I take my pay under an act of Congress.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do not yield further. That is all I have to say on this branch of the case. But I have a little more in the same connection. The occasion of the assault on me was a manifest one. On the day before yesterday, in reply to some remarks made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] I, in my place in this House, in parliamentary and courteous language expressed my views upon the bill pending before the House and upon the bill we were seeking to repeal. I expressed myself without hesitation, without scrupling to say precisely what I meant to say. Within a very short time after I made those remarks I was warned by a distinguished gentleman upon this floor, who was a leader in passing the bill of last year, that a castigation was in store for me, and that children must not cry when hard knocks were given.

I answered the gentleman, with what courage I could assume under such a formidable demonstration, that I thought the "children" in my part of the house would be ready whenever the "children" in his part of the House were. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] who gave me this warning did not see fit to appear in the castigation thus to be administered, nor directly to procure it to be administered, but, reaching his great arm around the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] whose remarks I had answered, through him procured the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] to present, as his representative, the proposition which he did present.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman is entirely incorrect in that statement.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. The gentleman from New York is entirely mistaken. The gentleman from Massachusetts never said one word to me upon that subject, nor did the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. I say that every word relating to me in the statement of the gentleman from New York is untrue.

Mr. HALE, of New York. If the gentleman who gave me my information, and who is a member of this House, will allow me, I will name my authority for the statement.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, [holding in his hand a volume of the Statutes at Large.] I am ready to give the gentleman all the information I have. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do not yield to the gentleman for any further information. I say that I have the authority of a gentleman on this floor, whom I will name if he will permit me, for the statement that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana was put before this House at the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin; and it came pursuant to the warning which the gentleman from Massachusetts had given me.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the selection made by the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Wisconsin, of a gentleman to administer this castigation to me, was an eminently appropriate selection.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, rose.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do not yield. I say it was an eminently proper selection.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I rise to——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor, and declines to yield.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman from Indiana who made this assault upon me made, the day before, a similar assault upon my colleague, the Representative at large from the State of New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] to be followed on the next day (the same which he reserved for my castigation) by a retraction which some outside of Congress might consider a humiliating retraction.

The selection was judicious in another aspect, in that the gentleman from Indiana is the special representative upon this floor of a class of men to whom the passage of the act of March 3, 1873, increasing salaries, was due. Of the classes of men who passed that bill I have this to say: There was one class—of whom the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is the leader, the head and front—who stated their propositions boldly, fairly, and squarely to the House, and who sustained their views from beginning to end by their language and their votes. Those gentlemen on the highest vote which they attained numbered some eighty-odd out of two hundred and forty members of the House. Those eighty-odd are the only members who ever put themselves squarely upon the record in favor of that legislation as an independent proposition.

But there was in this House another class of men, of whom I take the gentleman from Indiana as a type. This class is composed of those who by their votes, when forced to a direct and square vote, condemned the proposition, and then when they could escape from that responsibility and carry to their constituents the idea that they were opposed to this measure, which most them when they went back to their constituents characterized as a "salary steal," or "grab," contrived clandestinely and by subterfuge to procure the passage of the bill with the aid of the men who favored it from first to last.

Now, I give very briefly the record of the gentleman from Indiana upon this very question in the Forty-second Congress. The first proposition made in regard to that salary question was a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to suspend the rules and instruct the Committee on Appropriations to include in the provisions of the miscellaneous appropriation bill in the Committee of the Whole a provision for increased salaries, substantially as contained in the bill finally passed, though it put the pay of members at $8,000 instead of $7,500. On that vote the yeas and nays were called; and 81 members voted in favor of it, 120 members against it, and 39 members did not vote—of which 39 members the gentleman from Indiana was one. That resolution of instruction therefore failed. The question then came up in Committee of the Whole, where, as the House is well aware, the yeas and nays could not be called.

Mr. PELHAM. I rise to a point of order. It is that the gentleman from New York obtained unanimous consent to make a personal explanation, and under that consent he is out of order in the line of discussion he is now pursuing.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to go on.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. So do I.

Several MEMBERS. But there must be a reply.

The SPEAKER. As the House is aware, the right to make a personal explanation is obtained by unanimous consent; but when such consent is obtained the latitude of debate under the usage of the House is very wide.

Mr. COBURN. I hope, if this thing is to continue, unanimous consent will be given for a reply.

The SPEAKER. No doubt the House will give such consent.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The bill went to the Committee of the Whole, where, as we all know, the yeas and nays cannot be demanded; and so the country has no record of the votes of members there. On the reporting of the bill from the Committee of the Whole the gentleman from Massachusetts, in order to carry his point, moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole in a bulk. On that motion the yeas and nays were taken. The yeas were 69, and nays 121; the gentleman from Indiana voting no, and thus placing himself on the record as condemning the proposition to pass this bill with the amendments. Immediately after the defeat of this motion, a motion was made to reconsider that vote and lay the motion to reconsider on the table, thus clinching the vote which defeated the bill as reported from the Committee on Appropriations with the salary increase in it. Pending that motion the gentleman from Massachusetts moved to adjourn. It was a test vote, though not a vote that the people would see to be a test vote; for every man in the House knew that to refuse to adjourn, and then vote to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote just taken, clinched the defeat of the bill. On that motion to adjourn the gentleman from Indiana voted yea; and the yeas were 113, nays 60. There he was found not taking the responsibility of voting for the increased pay, but directly voting to defeat a proposition to nail the defeat of the bill.

On the next day the question came up again; and then the vote recurring directly on the motion to lay on the table, which, as I have said, would have clinched the defeat of the increased salary bill, the motion to lay on the table was rejected by a vote of 66 yeas to 165 nays, the gentleman from Indiana voting no; that is to say, having voted on one day for the defeat of the measure, the moment the question came up making that defeat final by laying on the table a motion to reconsider, he voted no. Following that came the vote on the motion to reconsider, and that motion, under the lead of the gentleman from Massachusetts, was carried—yeas 104, nays 79—the gentleman from Indiana, who had voted an hour before against laying the motion to reconsider on the table, judiciously abstaining from voting. And finally, when the vote recurred on the passage of the appropriation bill with this increased salary in it, on which I know that many members voted from a consideration of the necessity of passing the appropriation bill—when that vote was taken the gentleman voted yea.

I submit that this record sustains the proposition I made, that that gentleman is to be taken as a type and representative of those who are responsible for the carrying of this measure through that House, and yet had not the courage and the manhood to go before the people fairly and squarely upon it. With that record I am not surprised that the gentleman from Indiana should be selected as the instrument to make this attack upon me. I have before now known similar cases. It is not an uncommon thing to find among men or beasts those who, when themselves defiled, are anxious to defile by their contact, or in any other way, all those whom they can reach.

I have seen, Mr. Speaker, a cur emerging from a puddle, with his hair draggling with filth, force his way among decent people, and thrust himself upon them, or shake his filth upon them. I have known that experiment tried, and have known decent people to be smirched; but I have never discovered that the cur who did it remained anything else but a dirty dog. And I believe that will always inevitably be the case.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank the House for the opportunity given me to make this explanation.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, we have just had a very admirable exhibition of the dirty dog. [Laughter and some applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair must repeat what he has already had occasion to state within the last two or three days, that all such manifestations are strictly prohibited under the rules. The Chair must again request the attention of gentlemen to this.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I asked for the gentleman from New York the consent of the House that he might proceed without interruption. I ask the same favor from the House for myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not allow the gentleman to be interrupted.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. The gentleman from New York seems to have been stirred up by a proposition that I made yesterday to amend the bill that was then before the House, commonly known as the salary bill; and since yesterday afternoon he seems to have busied himself in hunting up my record on that question. Mr. Speaker, the record that I made on that question I have never shrunk from. I have not gone about the country calling out "salary grab;" nor have I ever in any way, to any man, under any circumstances, conceded that I had done anything that I had not the right to do and that I could not do consistently with my integrity and my honor.

Now, sir, when I discussed that question here before the House a few days ago I defined my position upon it. But the gentleman has gone back, expecting to make a little capital out of the votes that I gave, and has undertaken to show that I had voted inconsistently or that I had been dodging the responsibility that rested upon me as a Representative upon this floor; and he goes back and says, when my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] brought this bill before the House for the first time, and the House was brought to a vote upon it, that I did not vote. I know I did not vote, and I can tell the gentleman from New York why I did not vote. It was because this House had sent me to the city of Boston for the purpose of taking testimony in the Credit Mobilier investigation, and I was in the city of Boston at the time at which these votes were taken. Is that a sufficient explanation of that absence of voting for the gentleman from New York?

A MEMBER. It is not so stated on the record.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Well, sir, I do not know that my absence is explained. I do not suppose it is explained in the Globe, because there was no friend of mine, I presume, who thought it important enough to get up here and state that I was absent in the city of Boston at the time that vote was taken.

But the question came up after I returned; I came back here, and for twenty days that salary bill was never heard of; nobody expected it would be heard of again during the session. The gentlemen here now who were members of the Forty-second Congress remember very well that on a certain night, late at night, after we had had a struggle over the bill that had been reported by the special committee of which I was the chairman, and that bill had been attached as an amendment to the appropriation bill, then my friend from Massachusetts moved to amend the same bill still further by placing the increase of salary upon it. And then, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] says, I voted against it. Now, all the gentlemen who are here to-day members of this House who were members of the last House know very well that that occurred late at night—I think about half-past eleven, if my memory serves me aright.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Nearer twelve, a great deal.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Near twelve o'clock at night. The House had been in session from eleven o'clock in the morning until near twelve o'clock at night; a motion was then made to adjourn, and there were a great many gentlemen who voted to adjourn on that occasion who never in any manner, shape, or form voted for the increase of salary. And when the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] comes here to-day and says that that was dodging, he says that which is an attempt to cast a stigma upon a great many gentlemen who voted just as I did upon that motion to adjourn, yet who never voted for the salary bill in any shape.

Now what else? He says that the next morning when the proposition to reconsider came up I did not vote. Well, it just so happened, as it often has happened with a great many members, that at the time that vote was taken I had been called over to the Senate and did not vote, for I did not get back here until the vote had been finally announced.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman skips one vote, the one just before that, on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I am very thankful to the gentleman for calling my attention to that subject, because I want to say a word in regard to it. The proposition was made to increase the salary of members of Congress to $7,500. The House voted it down, and I was found, as the gentleman says, voting against it. The next morning, when the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] came up to reconsider the vote rejecting that proposition, Mr. SARGENT, of California, who had been opposing this increase of salary from the beginning, arose in his place upon this floor and stated to the House that he was tired of having this matter of the inequality of mileage thrown at him. He stated that in consequence of the mileage he was getting largely more compensation than other gentlemen who were sitting here with him, of whom I was one, and he proposed to the House that if they would reconsider that vote he would offer an amendment to the bill, placing the salary at $6,500 and cutting off all mileage and perquisites, which he stated would equalize salaries and be a fair compensation; that it would not materially increase the aggregate amount that was then taken out of the Treasury for the salaries of Senators and Members, and that it would equally distribute the compensation among the members of Congress. That was the proposition he submitted to the House, and upon that proposition the House reconsidered its former vote. There was a distinct understanding with all the members of the House that if the former action of the House was reconsidered Mr. SARGENT should move the amendment he had indicated.

And just as soon as the motion to reconsider was agreed to, as my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and others here will remember, Mr. SARGENT did move the amendment he had indicated, and the House adopted it. My friend here [Mr. DAWES] nods his head. He remembers it very well, and others also remember it. The bill with that provision, $6,500 a year, went to the Senate. We all know what transpired there. Some Senators insisted that it was no substantial increase of salary, and they were opposed to it for that reason. And any man who will examine the debates that took place in the Senate upon that subject will see that the Senate voted in such a way as to throw the matter into a committee of conference. It went to a committee of conference; my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was on it to represent the House. He had labored on the bill—an important appropriation bill—for months and months. It involved the appropriation of millions and millions of dollars; it furnished the means for carrying on the machinery of the Government.

The committee of conference reported in favor of increasing the amount of compensation to $7,500 a year. It was just in the last hours of the session; it was on a bill containing these large appropriations, and involving other large interests, including the Credit Mobilier law. In that way the matter came back to the House. The question was whether we should defeat that appropriation bill and all the interests involved in it, or pass it with all the increase of salary attached to it; and I stood here in my place and voted for that conference report, and under like circumstances I would do the same thing again. I believed it to be my duty as a Representative upon this floor to vote for the report of the committee of conference. Even my friend from New York, who opposed the conference report, admitted to the House the danger of defeating that bill. He said in his place that if that bill was defeated and there was an extra session of Congress it would cost many times more money than this increase of salary; and he further said that, much as he objected to the report, he would hesitate before he would take the responsibility of bringing on an extra session by rejecting the report.

Mr. SARGENT, of California, who had been voting against the increase straight along, warned gentlemen of the House not to vote against the report. He said he would vote for it, and I believe he did vote for it.

And my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who had voted against it eighteen times, I believe, said here upon the floor that he had opposed this salary increase in the committee of conference—that he had done everything he could against it. Yet he said to the House that under the circumstances he believed it to be the duty of the House to vote for that report and pass the bill.

I am content with the record I have made upon that subject, and out of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] thinks he can make a little capital. If he wants to point me out as the type of a class, I can say that if I am the type of any class it is as an independent man, who dares to stand up in his place, in defiance of him and of all others like him, and do what he believes in his conscience to be right under the circumstances by which he is surrounded.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have a word or two more to say. I introduced this proposition of amendment that the gentleman refers to on yesterday, and he says that I sought to fix a stigma upon him. Well, sir, the gentleman from New York has been running about this House for several days past prescribing clean linen for everybody else, and as he prescribes clean linen for me, I do not propose that he shall wear a dirty shirt, and, therefore, I offered that proposition to amend, to which he has referred, and I offered it for the express purpose of getting an opportunity to call the attention of this House to the remarks that the gentleman had made just a day before. Ah, he is exceedingly sensitive now about having a stigma cast upon him!

Mr. HALE, of New York. Not at all.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. He said he accepted it. Now I send to the Clerk's desk the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I ask the Clerk to read what the gentleman was pleased to say about the members of the Forty-second Congress in his speech of the day before yesterday.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The third proposition on which this popular condemnation rested, and, in my judgment, the weightiest of all, relates to the manner in which the act was done. It was not done by square, manly, honest legislation. This House in the Forty-second Congress repeatedly, by large majorities, voted down the proposition for an increase of their pay when presented as a bold and naked proposition, and then by trick and subterfuge and evasion ingrafted the increase upon a bill on which they could have some excuse for saying, "We vote ourselves increased pay purely as a matter of necessity, because we must do it or defeat the appropriations for the support of the Government."

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Now, I call the attention of the House, and especially of gentlemen who served in the Forty-second Congress, to the manner in which this gentleman has seen fit to talk about them. He says that the thing was not done by "fair, manly, and honest legislation." He means by that, as a matter of course, that it was unmanly and dishonest legislation. That is what he is charging upon the members of the Forty-second Congress.

That is the manner in which he has been talking about this matter, and any man who will go and look at the Globe will see that the gentleman made an assertion here that was entirely without foundation in fact, and if he had been as industrious in hunting up the facts of the case as he was in hunting up my votes he would have found it out before he got up and made his statement here.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Does the gentleman dispute my statement?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. There is not any truth in it.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. The gentleman has had his say, and I decline to yield to him.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to my colleague being interrupted.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Now, what have the members of the Forty-second Congress been doing? Why, taking the pay pursuant to the Constitution that was fixed by law, and a law that they had a right to make—the same kind of law that had been made in times past by the very best and purest men in the Government. It is because of this that he is making this virulent attack upon the members of the Forty-second Congress. I wanted to bring to the attention of the House the fact that the gentleman who is seeking to stigmatize the members of the Forty-second Congress in this matter had been doing the very identical thing himself, only in an aggravated degree, because I say here, and the gentleman can get up and deny it if he sees fit to do so, that during the last two years he has been getting a salary of $10,000 per year as a Government attorney, and during the time he has been a member of this House, since the 4th of March last until he took the oath of office, he has been drawing salary from the Government at the rate of $10,000 a year and expenses, in addition to his salary as a member of Congress at the rate of $7,500 per year, and yet he complains of members of Congress because they get $7,500——

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. No; I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman said he would yield if I chose to deny it.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist that my colleague shall not be interrupted in this way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will protect the gentleman from Indiana in his right to the floor without interruption.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. While he was taking fees from the Government of the United States at the rate of $10,000 a year up to the time that he took his seat, at the same time he was drawing the same compensation that you and I have been drawing under the law. And how does he defend that now? By saying that Congress had passed a law authorizing him to receive those fees. What was that law? He says that the salary law was not passed by square, manly, honest legislation. Now let us see what kind of a law it was which authorized him to draw compensation at the rate of $10,000 a year in addition to what the rest of you have got. Here is the law. I will read it myself:

> An act to authorize the continued employment of an agent and counsel of the United States.
> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in his discretion, to continue the appointment and employment of the present agent and counsel of the United States, under articles 12 to 17 inclusive of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concluded May 8, 1871; and for said agent and counsel to act under such continued appointment and employment, notwithstanding the election of said agent and counsel as a Representative in the Forty-third Congress: Provided, That such appointment and employment shall not continue after said agent and counsel shall have taken the oath of office as said Representative.

That law was especially framed to enable the gentleman from New York to draw this enormous salary; at the same time he was drawing his salary as a Representative until the day he took the oath of office.

Now, it happened that we had upon the statute-books a law prohibiting this gentleman from drawing this salary. The law was expressly against it. He had to take an oath of office in serving under the Department of Justice.

Mr. HALE, of New York. That is a mistake.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. He was not authorized by law to draw this money; therefore he must have a special act of Congress passed for his benefit. Now let us see whether this legislation under which the gentleman has been drawing that salary has been entirely "honest" and "square." I hold in my hand the Globe, showing how this thing got through; and it simply shows that this bill came here from the Senate, went upon the Speaker's table, and from there it was taken on the very last day of the session, on the 3d day of March—the same day on which I cast the vote for the conference report the gentleman has been talking about. The very same day on which this appropriation bill was passed, this bill for the benefit of the gentleman was, in the night-time, taken from the Speaker's table and passed without one word of debate or explanation. Was that "manly?" Was that "honest?" If the other measure was unmanly and dishonest, I think this stands in the same category. Hence when this gentleman was throwing these things in the faces of members of the Forty-second Congress, and seeking to cast stigmas upon them, I thought it high time that he should cover into the Treasury this money that he had thus taken out of it.

I thank the House very much for having indulged me thus long. The salary bill having passed away from this House, I had supposed that was the end of the whole matter. I should never have referred to these stigmas that the gentleman has sought to cast upon me and my associates in the Forty-second Congress but for the manner in which he has brought this matter up to-day.

Mr. ELDREDGE was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] to yield to me.

Mr. GARFIELD. If this personal debate is to go on, I hope gentlemen will name what time they want to occupy.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want only five minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Take ten.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I only wish to occupy a few minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I propose that during the continuance of this debate each speech shall be limited to five minutes.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not wish to be restricted in that way.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will not insist on that restriction.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; I withdraw the proposition; but I think gentlemen ought to confine their speeches to at least ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] is recognized and will proceed, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Speaker, nothing could have been further from my expectation than the discussion in which we are this morning engaged; and I little expected that the gentleman from New York would attempt to drag me into his "personal explanation." When I had spoken day before yesterday on the salary bill he responded immediately, and I thought that some of the expressions which fell from him were, in view of the position which I knew he occupied, and upon which I had never commented or remarked in any way, unbecoming and out of place. I ask the Clerk to read the passage which I have marked from his speech.

The Clerk read as follows:

The complaint made against the statute increasing the pay of members of this House was, as I understand, first and last in regard to the amount as being excessive. I believe that the sentiment of the better class of the community was that the amount fixed by that bill was larger than it ought to be, irrespective of every other consideration; and I for one especially believe that it was larger than it ought to be in proportion to the other official salaries paid by the people of this country in the administration of their State and National Governments.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The word "last" is a misprint: it should read "first and least in regard to the amount as being excessive."

Mr. ELDREDGE. I had served in Congress with the gentleman from New York; and I supposed that our personal respect was mutual. I had no idea that anything which I had done since he left Congress, and while he was in another capacity in the service of the United States, had lost me his esteem. But when he undertook to impute to me not only a wrong act but a wrong motive, I remembered what he had done during the period between his leaving Congress and his return. When he, a distinguished lawyer, said that the objection was "first and last in regard to the amount" of pay, that it was too much, I remembered to have heard of him when he was satisfied with $3, or $5, or $10 a day as an attorney, and was very glad to get either of those sums. I knew that since then he had been a member of Congress, and had grown to be a great lawyer, and more recently had demanded $10,000 a year for serving the United States. I had heard this; and I thought it unbecoming in him to charge me with voting too much for a member of Congress when I only voted $7,500 and he was charging at the same time $10,000 for his services. I could not see why he was not worth as much as a member of Congress as he was as an attorney at law.

Now, the gentleman complains that this attack upon him, this "stigma," as he calls it, was suggested by me. He says that I, in conjunction with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (who I believe he said had his arm around me,) concocted this scheme and employed the gentleman from Indiana to cast a stigma upon him by simply giving a narrative of this short period of his life. I did not so consider it unless there was something bad in it, something bad in the life itself.

Now, if that stigmatizes him it is his fault and not mine. I did suggest that he be questioned upon his pay, but I did not suggest it to the gentleman from Massachusetts or the gentleman from Indiana. I never shrink from anything that I do on this floor or elsewhere. I suggested it to a gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I did ask him when you [addressing Mr. HALE, of New York] were making your speech to put the question to you which I put to you and which you say was "impertinent." I wanted him to ask you if you had not been the recipient from the United States Government of $10,000 a year; and I supposed that, being an honest, upright, and pure man, and your conscience approving the course which you had pursued, you might answer it like an honest man and would not think it "impertinent."

I thought the inquiry was pertinent to the subject upon which he was arraigning the members of the last Congress. I thought his conduct, if it had been as I supposed, was a perfect answer to his speech; at least, as far as he was concerned. I thought if he had done the same things as those he was charging upon us, that he, being honest and pure, would not consider us as dishonest in doing as he had done.

The gentleman admitted the proposition which had so often been admitted in the House, that the law of Congress was a constitutional law, giving us the salary as prescribed. I cannot say that the law by which he received his $10,000 was a constitutional law. Perhaps it was. I am rather under the impression, however, that when he was first employed there was no law for his employment. I am under the impression that the first pay he received was received without law, but I may be mistaken upon that point. I do not charge that. I put it on the ground that it was legal. But will the gentleman tell me by what ethics, or logic, or morality he charges me with wrong in taking the pay of $7,500 as a servant of the United States, at the same time when he takes $17,500 as a servant of the United States? If when a man is elected to Congress his whole time and services and mind and judgment are due to the Government because of his election, and his being a servant of the United States, why did not the gentleman leave that $10,000 in the Treasury and receive only his pay as a member of Congress? But if the repeal of that statute of 1808 was proper and right, and all his acts legal, honest, upright, and pure, how could he with the views expressed in his speech take two salaries at the same time? He tells us he took them as every man takes professional fees. Lawyers in Congress may, perhaps, take professional fees of clients while in Congress with propriety when the client is not the United States. But the gentleman is employed by the year as a member of Congress at $7,500; he is employed by the year as an attorney at $10,000. What other lawyer in this House is receiving two salaries at the same time?

Is not receiving $10,000 as a servant of the United States in one capacity and $7,500 in another capacity, rendering no services in the latter, quite equal to back pay—quite equal to members taking the increased pay?

I did think that it came with an ill grace from the gentleman, following me as he did, and stigmatizing not only my act but my motive. And now if the gentleman has any stigma upon him, if he feels himself dirtied or befouled, it was not done by the gentleman from Indiana or by the gentleman from Massachusetts, or myself, but it was by the pool in which he chose to wallow for the sum of $17,500.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No man can regret more than I do this unfortunate scene which has occurred in this House. It is such language, whether parliamentary or not, that gentlemen apply to other members on this floor which gives those outside occasion to stigmatize the whole Congress. And I was very, very sorry that the heat of debate should have so far misled the cooler judgment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] to say that which I know he will regret. I have been on terms of quite intimate friendship with that gentleman for a very considerable length of time. I knew his services in the place of agent and counsel of the United States. I know they were well performed and valuable; nor do I think that what he received for those services was anything too much—$10,000 a year, which, I believe, was the rate at which he drew payment for those services.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Besides expenses.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And that being so I should not have adverted to such receipt as a wrong. But when he arose in his place the other day and characterized the legislation of the Forty-second Congress as unfair, unmanly, and dishonest, carried through by a trick, I thought he had exceeded the fair limits of debate; especially when he was speaking of a man who stood in the relation of a personal friend. When he said that, without consulting anybody, I sent for the book I hold in my hand and put it on my friend's desk, from which I had his liberty to speak—the book of the laws—and turned down the leaf at the law. And I am sure he must not have appreciated me during our intimacy if he supposes that I ever "select" anybody to do my work for me when I want to give a castigation to any one. [Laughter.]

The thing I next did (for I never proceed without facts) was to telegraph to the Register of the Treasury to get the statement of the gentleman's accounts, and I got it. And when I got into the position to show that on the same day, in the same hour, his legislation—which continued his office while a member—passed without discussion, and the legislation which I promoted had passed with full discussion, I thought I would thereby have brought him to his feet and to admit, "Well, I was a little too fast." Instead, feeling kindly toward him, I went to him, and good-naturedly said a portion of what he reports, in the intimacy of private friendship, not knowing at that time that anybody was going to do or say anything about it. And I will ask him to consider how long gentlemen can remain together on this floor as gentlemen if we report private conversations with each other?

Mr. HALE, of New York. If the gentleman asks that of me, will he let me ask him a question right here?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman came up in front of my seat, and, if I remember rightly, uttered what he had to say at least in the hearing of three or four members, without any of the sacredness or intimacy of private conversation.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then that is a perfect justification to the gentleman if he so understood it. I was speaking to him privately; but I do not say anything privately which I am ashamed to say in public. I said to him then, "Now, having come at me, you must not object or cry if you get hurt in the contest." [Laughter.] I was fully determined whenever I got the opportunity to debate to bring two or three facts to the gentleman's mind, one of which I have already brought to the attention of the House. After that my friend from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] called upon me and said he would like to get the floor, and I asked him why. And he showed me the amendment he had drawn up and which he proposed to present to the House. I supposed he would get the floor before me because I had kept myself out of the debate very purposely, and while I was sorry my thunder was gone by his use of it I bore the infliction as well as I could. [Laughter.] That is all I had to do with the selection or employment of the gentleman from Indiana. "My offending hath this extent, no more."

And I forebore, in the remarks I made last evening, from saying a word as to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] out of gratitude to him, because the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] had yielded him some time as he informed me, and he offered me a portion of it to reply to some attacks made upon me last evening in the closing hour of the debate, when it seemed to me I should not get any other opportunity; and I always pay my debts. [Laughter.] Therefore, I said not a word of him. I granted him the mercy of my silence. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have no cause to complain that the gentleman drew his salary as a member of Congress. He had a right to it. He earned it. We have no right to complain that he drew his pay as counsel from the Treasury at the same time. He had a right to fees. I repeat again, in the face of the country, that he earned it faithfully and well. We have no right to complain that he took the $10,000—and his share of the $7,500 during the same time, because "the law allows it, and the court awards it." He had a right to both. What we have the right to complain of is, that while in the receipt of that generous income from the Treasury of the Government of $17,500, he should complain of and seek to take away our share of the $7,500 we have only. [Laughter.] It looks like the rich man taking the ewe lamb of the poor man. [Laughter.] Of that we complain.

It is true, under the law, except the special law made in favor of the gentleman, no man can draw two salaries at the same time.

I recollect, Mr. Speaker, while the war was going on I heard your eloquent denunciation of that being done, that no man had a right as counsel to take one fee from the United States while as member of Congress he was receiving a salary. I also remember soldiers from the battle-field, General Schenck and General Blair, one of them with the wounds of battle upon him, being elected to Congress and, the question coming before Congress, were made to elect between the pay they would draw as major-generals in the field and their salary as members of Congress, as they were expressly cut off by law from taking both; although wounds and service upon the battle-field are the highest title to reward on earth. I also put it to the clear judgment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] whether he believes, if the House of Representatives had understood, on that night when this law was passed, that it would give him double salary, we would have passed it. [Laughter.] No; I am sure if he had been here he would not have voted for it himself. [Laughter.] I am sure of this because I have such confidence in his judgment and in his integrity. But, being the law, he had the legal right and the moral right, because all legal rights are moral in human actions, leaving the propriety of their enforcement to the judgment and conscience of each man for himself; and therefore, having the legal right, he had the moral right to take both salaries, if he chose. But what I complain of is, that he has no moral right, or legal right, or parliamentary right, or conscientious right, or any other right, of the thousand forms of rights accruing in this world, to charge those who stand equal with him before the country with wrong-doing, when they were doing the same thing with himself in a less degree.

I can refer him to high authority on this, and ask him to look at the eighth chapter of the Gospel of St. John. [Laughter.] When the woman was taken in adultery and brought before the Master, what was His reply? Was it you are wrong and immoral? No; but turning to her accusers He said: "Let him who is without sin amongst you cast a stone at her." [Laughter.] Could my friend have led the stoning party on that occasion as he did the salary party in this House? [Renewed laughter.] I ask him in all fairness and sincerity, and I shall not in anything I say violate the obligations of friendship I still entertain for him, what was the answer? All the accusers went out and left the woman standing alone before the Master, and He said to her, "Go, and sin no more." [Laughter.] That is what we have attempted in this House in the matter of salary, [laughter,] only our accusers have not gone out. [Renewed laughter.]

CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. ELLIOTT, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the National Convention of Colored Persons, praying to be protected in their civil rights; which was read, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

TEMPORARY LOANS.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution, calling for information from the Treasury Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to furnish this House with a statement of the total amount of money received on temporary loans under the acts of February 25, March 17, and July 11, 1862, and the act of June 30, 1864, stating specifically the largest amount on deposit under each act at any time, and the rate of interest thereon, together with the amount of said certificates presented for payment, exclusive of exchange for other securities in each month, and while said certificates were outstanding; also whether any of said certificates, and if so, what amount, was paid and redeemed out of the redemption fund of $50,000,000 authorized by said acts to be held by the Secretary for the prompt payment of said temporary loans.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, is required under the rules to lie over for one day unless by unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. Luckey, one of his secretaries, notifying the House that he had approved and signed an act (H. R. No. 478) to provide for the redemption of the loan of 1858.

LOUISIANA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Elections, reported the following resolutions; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Randall L. Gibson, from the second congressional district of Louisiana, be permitted to serve on Lionel A. Sheldon, sitting member from said district, notice of contest within twenty days from the 9th of December, 1873; and that said sitting member be permitted to answer the same within twenty days after service thereof.

Resolved, That the time for taking testimony in said contested-election case is hereby extended to ninety days from the time the answer is allowed to be filed to the notice of contest.

ARKANSAS CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. TODD, from the Committee on Elections, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That in the matter of contest in the second district of Arkansas, O. P. Snyder, the sitting member, have leave to retake lost testimony within thirty days from date on reasonable notice to his opponent.

GOLD BULLION DEPOSITS.

Mr. HOOPER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 793) authorizing the issue of certificates for the return of the net coinage value of gold bullion deposited at the mints and assay offices of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

REGENTS OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER. Under the law it is the duty of the Speaker to appoint three regents for the Smithsonian Institution, and the Chair appoints the following gentlemen, to serve during the year from this month: Mr. E. R. HOAR, of Massachusetts; Mr. S. S. COX, of New York; and Mr. G. W. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported back adversely a resolution providing for the printing of 2,000 extra copies of the President's message and accompanying documents; and moved that the same be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL REPORTS.

Mr. DONNAN, from the same committee, also reported back the following resolution, with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed of the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the years 1872 and 1873, 255,000 copies of each, 180,000 of each of which shall be for the use of the House, 50,000 of each for the use of the Senate, and 25,000 of each for the distribution by the Commissioner of Agriculture; and those for the use of the House and Senate shall be so marked by the clerks of the respective bodies as that they may pass by the mails free of postage; and such seeds as shall be furnished by that Department to the members of either House for distribution be marked in like manner and for the same purpose by the clerks of the respective Houses.

Mr. DONNAN. The amendment of the committee is to strike out the following words:

Those for the use of the House and Senate shall be so marked by the clerks of the respective bodies as that they may pass by the mails free of postage, and such seeds as shall be furnished by that Department to the members of either House for distribution be marked in like manner and for the same purpose by the clerks of the respective Houses.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. I desire to ask the Chair whether a report from the Committee on Printing, which, in addition to a provision for printing documents, includes general legislation on the subject of postal arrangements, is one that can be made at any time.

Mr. DONNAN. I will say that the committee recommend the striking out of that part of the resolution; and they do so because the committee had no jurisdiction in relation to questions of postage.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. My point is that if the amendment reported by the committee to strike out that part of the resolution is in order, it is in order for the House to leave that matter in the resolution.

The SPEAKER. That is the effect of it; and that being the case it deprives the Committee on Printing of the privilege of reporting at any time. The Committee on Printing is authorized to report at any time on what is legitimately connected with their duties—the printing of documents; but anything else in the shape of legislation is not in order except on a call of the committee. It is true the committee report a recommendation that that portion of the resolution be stricken out; but suppose the House refuses to strike it out, then they bring the resolution in as a matter of privilege when it is not so, and the Chair must, on the question of order, decline to receive the report.

EXTRAORDINARY EXPENSES OF THE NAVY.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 481) making appropriations for extraordinary expenses of the naval service, with the amendment of the Senate thereto, with the recommendation that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The Clerk read the amendment of the Senate, as follows:

Page 2, strike out lines 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, as follows:

"And the appropriations herein made may be, in case of necessity to meet expenses already incurred and contracted for, transferred from one Bureau to another by special order of the President; which order, with the reasons therefor, shall be communicated to Congress whenever the good of the public service will permit."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF OFFICIAL REPORTERS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No 794) making an appropriation to pay the salaries of the official reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It appropriates out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $25,185 for the payment of the five official reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House of Representatives during the first year of the Forty-third Congress; said reporters to be paid monthly at the rate fixed by law.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit, in explanation of this bill, the following letter from one of the official reporters:

WASHINGTON, December 18, 1873.

DEAR SIR: Allow me to call your attention and that of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact that the official reporters of debates in the House of Representatives have not so far received any pay since the 4th of March last, and to respectfully request that an appropriation be made therefor.

The facts, in brief, are these: At the expiration of the contract with the proprietors of the Congressional Globe the House, by resolution of March 3, 1873, provided that the reports of the House proceedings and debates shall be furnished to the Congressional Printer by the present corps of Globe reporters, who shall hereafter, until otherwise ordered, be officers of the House, under direction of the Speaker, and shall receive the same compensation now allowed to the official reporters of committees. (Journal 3, 42, pp. 582, 583. See also Congressional Globe.)

The rate at which stenographers for committees are paid is $5,037 per annum, as will be seen by reference to the statutes. There are now five official reporters of debates; and while in other years the number has been larger, they do not ask the number shall be increased nor that the clerks they are compelled to employ to get out the debates as rapidly as is now done shall be paid otherwise than out of the salary received by the reporters themselves. The amount paid to clerks yesterday, for instance, in getting out the debates, was, on an average, $8 by each reporter.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. J. MCELHONE,
For Official Reporters.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations.

I desire to call the attention of the House to the reason why the salaries of these officers have not been provided for. On the last day of the last Congress a change was made in the method of reporting and publishing the debates of Congress. Before that time it was done by the proprietors of the Congressional Globe. It was taken from their hands and put under the charge of the department of Public Printing; and the five reporters, formerly Globe reporters, were transferred and made officers of the House, and are to be paid now and wholly by the House, and not, as before, in part by the proprietors of the Globe under the old contract. On the last day of the last session a resolution was passed, which I read from the Journal of the House:

Resolved, That the reports of the House proceedings and debates shall be furnished to the Congressional Printer by the present corps of Globe reporters, who shall hereafter, until otherwise ordered, be officers of the House under direction of the Speaker, and shall receive the same compensation now allowed to the official reporters of committees.

That compensation was prescribed by law, and we propose to appropriate in this bill exactly the sum, to be paid monthly, that the law fixes for the official reporters of committees of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question in this connection: first, as to whether the compensation of the reporters is increased or diminished by this rate; and secondly, what are the indications up to this time as to whether the expense of publishing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is increased or diminished by taking it out of the hands of the former publishers and placing it under the control of the Public Printer?

Mr. GARFIELD. In answer to the first question I will say that I do not know precisely the amount that the Globe reporters received under their contract with Rives & Bailey; it was so much per column, and it depended on the amount of work done. We have paid them for many years $800 a year, besides what they received from Rives & Bailey, in order to make them officers of the House and responsible to the House. We had, however, established a rate of compensation for our two stenographers of committees, namely, a pay of $4,380 per annum, with 15 per cent. increase annually; which makes $5,037, the actual sum the committee reporters have received for several years past.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does that cover what the reporters are obliged to pay their clerks?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly; these reporters are required to furnish all their own clerks at their own cost.

And I am told that they sometimes pay as high as eight dollars a day for copyists to make their manuscript ready for the printers the night of the day when the debates take place. In answer to the second question of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] I am unable to say whether the present arrangement is more or less expensive than the old arrangement. I have lately heard it affirmed that it costs more to print the debates under the present arrangement than it did before. If that is so, the subject should be considered by the Committee on Printing and reported to the House. What the fact is I do not know.

Mr. MAYNARD. Do we not now pay exactly what it costs for labor and material, and no more, with no profits to anybody?

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose that to be the present arrangement.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TELEGRAPH BETWEEN THE CAPITOL AND DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table, for consideration at this time, Senate bill No. 89 in relation to the lines of telegraph connecting the Capitol with the various Departments of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I rise to a correction of the Journal. On the question of the engrossment of the salary bill last evening I voted "no." I am recorded as not voting. I desire the record to be corrected.

Mr. RANDALL. I object, if it will change the result.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Journal clerk that the gentleman is correctly recorded upon the Journal.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not correct.

The SPEAKER. Ah, the RECORD is a very different thing. This case illustrates the whole principle in regard to the reason of the rule forbidding any entry of a gentleman's name upon the roll-call if he did not vote at the time the roll was called. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] had not been recorded, and should now be allowed to record his vote, it would change the result. The vote was 131 to 130; if allowed now to have his vote recorded, it would make the vote 131 to 131, and change the result.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The Chair is mistaken as to the vote; I refer to the vote on the engrossment, not to the vote ordering the main question on the passage of the bill.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] relating to the distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, instruct me to report back the same amended so as to read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That the Congressional Printer be instructed to furnish to each Senator, and to each Member and Delegate in the House of Representatives, twenty-four copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or of any such like official report of the debates in Congress as may hereafter be authorized by law, either daily, as originally published, or in the revised form, without binding, or in bound volumes, or part in each form, as each Senator, Member, and Delegate may elect.

This resolution, as reported from the committee, restores precisely the old practice in regard to the published debates of the House, giving to each member, in such form as he may select of the three forms, twenty-four copies for distribution among his constituents. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was amended and adopted.

Mr. HALE, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLLISIONS AT SEA.

Mr. COX. I desire to present a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, having reference to collisions at sea. I will not ask to have it read to the House; but there is in it a tabular statement which should be printed, showing the number of collisions during the last six years, the number of lives lost, and the amount of property destroyed. The memorial asks for an international commission to fix the track of vessels on the ocean between the two continents, by parallels of latitude, so that there may not be in future these collisions as in the past. I ask that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

RULE FOR WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. COX. The Committee on the Rules have directed me to report the following resolution for an amendment to the rules of the House:

Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the House, viz:

All motions to withdraw papers from the files of the House shall be referred to the committee which last considered the case, who shall report without delay whether or not the copies shall be left on file; and such report may be made at any time. But original papers shall not be withdrawn in any case where an adverse report has been made; and whenever the report is adverse the same shall be in writing, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker, if there be no objection to this proposition, and if no member desires to put any question to me upon this matter, I will call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. NIBLACK rose.

Mr. COX. I yield to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.]

Mr. NIBLACK. When a person desires to obtain possession of the papers in some very unimportant matter, will not this proposed rule subject him to a great deal of trouble and inconvenience?

Mr. COX. The Committee on the Rules, who unanimously agreed to this report, considered the very question suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.] In such a case as he suggests, where no public interest is involved, the House will always, no doubt, grant unanimous consent for the withdrawal of important original papers necessary for the private interest of the party concerned. But there has grown up here a vicious practice by which the greatest facility has been afforded for the withdrawal of important original papers, no one objecting. In cases of private bills which are supposed to involve bad legislation, we ought always to have an adverse report from the committee that has examined the matter. The adoption of this rule would be a safeguard thrown around our files. I have consulted with the gentleman who has charge of this business in the Clerk's office; and the committee unanimously think that we ought to guard our archives in this way.

Mr. NIBLACK. So far as the proposed rule relates to cases in which there have been adverse reports, I have no question about the propriety of the amendment; nor do I doubt that some additional rule ought to be adopted on the subject of withdrawing papers. But it does occur to me, upon a cursory hearing of the resolution as read, that its adoption will impose a great deal of additional labor upon the committees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, being a member of the Committee on the Rules, will state that this rule, in its proper construction, will not apply to cases when papers are withdrawn for reference to a committee of the House, but only when it is proposed to move them entirely from the jurisdiction of the House.

Mr. COX. Under the present system, papers are carried from one committee to another, from one House to another, or taken to the courts; in this way papers are often withdrawn altogether from our possession, and thus the evidence upon which the House has acted is lost.

Mr. NIBLACK. In view of the statement which has been made by the Chair, I do not press any objection to the resolution.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I wish to inquire whether this proposed rule is an absolute prohibition in regard to the papers upon which an adverse report has been made?

Mr. COX. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. It is an absolute prohibition upon the withdrawal of the original papers where there has been an adverse report; it does not prevent copies being taken.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does it put it out of the power of the House to allow the original papers in such cases to be withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. Except by a suspension of the rules. It can be done by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think there ought to be some privilege in regard to the withdrawal of such papers; otherwise a party might lose his rights.

The SPEAKER. The rules can be suspended in any proper case.

Mr. COX. No doubt in every just case two-thirds of the House will give consent to the withdrawal of original papers by the parties interested. We are only trying to preserve the files of the House against the undue withdrawal of papers.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let me suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that in some cases—where, for instance, the original discharge of a soldier has been filed in this House, and an adverse report made upon the case—the party, if he desire to recover possession of his papers, may be subjected to a great deal of trouble if a two-thirds vote be necessary to give consent to the withdrawal. There might be a necessity for obtaining the papers in a hurry. It seems to me that the rule as reported goes too far.

Mr. NEGLEY. The case suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] is one that had occurred to me. I was about to suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that perhaps the committee had not reflected upon the embarrassment which such a rule might cause to applicants for pensions and bounties. Subsequently to the action of a committee, they may learn of the additional evidence that is necessary to complete the application for bounty or pension, and after they have subjected themselves to great labor and expense in searching out officers who, perhaps, may not be found immediately, it would do with such parties great injustice to deprive them of the opportunity of going again before the committee with additional evidence in the same case.

Mr. COX. I will say, in response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY,] that that very question was considered by the committee; the very illustration which he has put was considered; and under the proposed rule there will be ample opportunity by unanimous consent, or by a two-thirds vote suspending the rules, to withdraw from the files important papers in any good case, such as those he mentioned.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that he modify the proposed rule so that the House, by a majority vote, may allow the withdrawal of papers.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope that modification will be made.

Mr. COX. I am not authorized, of course, to make any change in the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, of course, is not in the habit of taking part in the discussions of the House; but being chairman of the Committee on the Rules, it is proper and in accordance with custom that he should explain the operation of the proposed rule, which he will be called upon to administer if it should be adopted. It provides in the first place that "all motions to withdraw papers from the files of the House shall be referred to the committee which last considered the case." This refers to applications to take papers away from the jurisdiction of the House; it does not refer to motions to withdraw papers for reference to a committee. The proposed rule provides further that the committee to whom the motion to withdraw is referred "shall report without delay whether or not copies shall be left on file, and such report may be made at any time." This will bring the question directly within the control of the majority of the House. In such a case as that suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY]—the case of a soldier's discharge—the Chair cannot conceive that an objection would ever be raised.

Mr. ELDREDGE. In the case suggested by him will it be within the control of a majority of the House?

The SPEAKER. Entirely, at any time.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is all I desire.

Mr. HOLMAN. I apprehend that a little familiarity with the committees having the control of such papers which are ordinarily sought to be withdrawn, would be necessary to understand such a rule as this. Very few papers are ever withdrawn from the files of the House, and very few are deemed necessary to be withdrawn. Such as the discharges of soldiers or deeds of property are sometimes offered and sometimes referred to the Committee on Claims, or to the Committee on Military Affairs, or the Committee on Naval Affairs. There are not, indeed, more than three or four committees which this question of the withdrawal of papers from the files of the House could involve; and the adoption of a change in the rules indicating the paper to be withdrawn would in my judgment be better than the proposition submitted by my friend from New York.

Very seldom is fraud perpetrated by the withdrawal of papers. Papers withdrawn are not of that character which would require great labor in copying them. They are ordinarily such papers where the copying of them requires but trifling labor. It seems to me, therefore, that the old rule is better than the proposed change in requiring that unanimous consent shall be given for the withdrawal of any paper from the files of the House, and that unanimous consent is generally given when copies are left. I know most of the papers which will be sought to be withdrawn are papers which will be referred to the Committee on War Claims, and if we require the members of that committee to go to the files of the House every time an application for withdrawal is made, and to examine the papers and report to the House, you will throw entirely too great a burden of labor upon that committee. The old rule, where a single objection to the withdrawal of papers is sufficient, will prevent the imposition of such enormous labor upon that committee as would of necessity break it down. I am opposed to breaking down the old rule, which in my judgment, is one of the best rules we ever had in this House, and I hope we will continue to insist that no paper shall be withdrawn from the files of the House unless unanimous consent has been obtained for the purpose.

The SPEAKER. In answer to the gentleman the Chair will state that, during his administration of the duties of Speaker and during the time he has served in the House, he has never known of a refusal of any request for the withdrawal of papers from the files of the House. They are put here upon the Speaker's desk with requests for leave of absence, and when those requests are presented to the House by the Chair, as well for withdrawal of papers as for leave of absence, very little attention is paid to them by the House. Here are half a dozen of them now. It requires unanimous consent, and, like the request of a member for leave of absence, it is seldom ever refused. No discrimination seems to be made between them.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the paper be indicated, as a soldier's discharge, or a deed filed for the purpose of proving title to property destroyed, the party should have the paper, and in such cases unanimous consent will always be granted for the withdrawal of the paper from the files of the House on the condition that copies be left. If everybody be allowed to take papers from the files of the House, as proposed in this change of the rules, members will not know anything about them; but if the rules should require that the paper proposed to be withdrawn should be indicated, then members will understand what is being done. And if the paper be such as I have indicated, in my judgment, there ought to be no objection to its withdrawal.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing in the rule to prevent unanimous consent being asked.

Mr. HOLMAN. Still the rule would be an ill-operative rule. The duties under it would never be performed.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman. This is admittedly a matter of some importance, and I ask we come to some agreement to postpone its further consideration for a day or two.

Mr. RANDALL. I think there is a great deal of unnecessary misapprehension in regard to this matter. Under the present rule providing for the withdrawal of papers from the files of the House by unanimous consent the practice has been shown to be pernicious, and that valuable papers have been taken from the files without proper consideration. In some instances, after the papers have been withdrawn they have been changed, and in their altered form brought back here and new claims based upon them. It was to prevent any recurrence of this evil that the Committee on the Rules, after full discussion of this question in connection with the Clerk having charge of the files of the House, have unanimously agreed to report the proposition now before the House. While the committee believe papers should be allowed to be withdrawn from the files of the House in certain cases, they have come to the conclusion this is the best rule which they, in their wisdom, can devise to control such withdrawal of papers.

Mr. McCRARY. Mr. Speaker, it happens to be within my personal knowledge that important papers have been removed from the files in the Clerk's office of this House. Perhaps I should not say my personal knowledge; but I have information from authority I cannot question that papers of the utmost importance in a litigation, and which were believed would have shown some frauds committed upon the Government, have been removed from the files of the House.

We all know, sir, that these papers are removed from the files on the request of any member sending a little memorandum to the Speaker asking him to submit that request to the House. And when a gentleman comes to this Hall and asks any member to make such a request in regard to the papers on the files of the House he will make the request almost as a matter of course. We are liable to be imposed upon in that way, and I think the rule proposed is not only very proper, but a very important one that ought to be adopted without delay.

Mr. COX. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to say just a word or two, and I will then call the previous question.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. COX. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I am heartily in favor of the proposition of the Committee on the Rules, and I deem it of the utmost importance that some such rule as they have reported should be adopted. It is a fact well known that in the prosecution of claims before Congress it is quite frequent, even after committees have acted upon them, for the papers to be withdrawn from before the committees on the committee being discharged from any further action or responsibility in connection with the subject. And it is true that in many instances where adverse reports have been made, and the cases have been withdrawn, these adverse reports have been withdrawn with the original papers. And in many cases, too, most important evidence that has been procured from the Departments of the Government for the purpose of resisting claims presented to Congress has been withdrawn with the other papers, and thus important evidence intended for the protection of the Government has been spirited away and lost; and it may very often be the case that a committee of the present Congress may thus be without access to testimony which would have a very important bearing on the claim to be considered. Therefore, I think it ought always to be a rule of the House that no papers shall be withdrawn unless a competent committee shall first examine and report upon the matter. This will prevent the withdrawal of important evidence from the files of the House; and therefore I support this proposition.

Mr. COX. I now yield to my colleague, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. I have never in my own experience known any serious difficulty to have arisen in connection with the withdrawal of papers. I have no doubt, however, that such difficulties may occur. Usually parties who use any proper degree of caution do not deposit important original papers with the committees, but get leave to leave copies of them instead. It does, however, happen that the original papers do sometimes get into our files; and it seems to me that that part of the resolution which forbids their being withdrawn is too stringent. Some provision ought to be made in common justice for the withdrawal in ordinary cases of original papers from the files, because there is no power in the Clerk to certify copies of them that shall be legal evidence in their stead. Beyond that it seems to me that the resolution is generally right.

The truth is that this passing bills by unanimous consent which we constantly permit here is the sort of business which is most dangerous and which attracts least attention—is that under cover of which the most improper things are frequently done. I have often thought that if one wished to get through the House something which could not be got through if the attention of the House was properly called to it, his best way would be to ask unanimous consent for it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is the easiest of all methods.

Mr. POTTER. Yes; because the fact that you rise to ask unanimous consent tends to disarm the suspicion of everybody. That portion of the resolution, therefore, which required an examination and report by a committee, I think, is proper. At the same time, that portion, if I heard it rightly, which forbids the withdrawal of original papers under any circumstances is, I think, too stringent.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] who has this matter in charge. It appears to me that the proposed rule might be a little cumbersome in this respect: When any matter is referred back to the committee it is to have the right to report at any time. Members are aware that that is a very great power which may be abused. Suppose that in any case which has excited great discussion and interest here, but has been disposed of and passed away, a member afterward desiring to bring the subject-matter before the House gets in a request for the withdrawal of papers, and the request is referred to the committee which has the right to report at any time—and the resolution not guarding the privilege of debate following upon that right, as I believe the language does not—may it not come up in the House at any time and give rise to debate and delay when the House is desirous of going to real business? I suggest that, because it seems to me that this difficulty may arise from a right to report at any time. Perhaps the gentleman from New York can modify the rule so that debate shall be shut off.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, under this rule, when the report was made by a committee, would not hold that it was a debatable question. The question would have to be decided without debate.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That would obviate the difficulty.

Mr. COX. And the case supposed probably would not occur one time in a thousand, even if the question were debatable.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I hope the House will give its attention to the point raised by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] because it seems to me that the multiplication of this authority to report at any time will do more than almost anything else to destroy the equality which exists between committees of this House. Of course these reports may at any time dispose of the morning hour, which is the only time when in this House the ordinary standing committees can get action. In order to meet that objection it will be necessary for the Speaker to hold that a report made under this rule would not be debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hold so, decidedly.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then, that being the only alternative, it is establishing a practice in regard to what may possibly be a very important question for the interest of the Government, requiring this House to act without debate. That is a practice which, it seems to me, is very objectionable in itself, contrary to the principle upon which all legislation and all free government is based, and it is a great deal better to strike out that part of the rule, and require these committees to whom such requests are referred either to report them on their ordinary call, or to get unanimous consent for a report out of order which will not really cause any debate. Ordinarily that unanimous consent would be given to the committee, just as it is now given, when the request is made without reference to a committee; when it came back from the committee, ordinarily no person would object.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Why cannot it be arranged that the investigation of the committee shall be final, and that, on being certified to the Clerk, the papers may be withdrawn, so that the question may not come back to the House? The Chair would rule, of course, as he has stated; but this is a rule for more time than the present, and another incumbent of the chair might rule that it does not shut off the right to debate, so that at any time the House might be precipitated into a debate when it was least required.

Mr. COX. I will obviate the difficulty by withdrawing that part of the resolution which authorizes the committee to report at any time.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF RULE 145.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am directed by the Committee on the Rules to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That Rule 145 be amended by inserting the following after the word "present" in the fifth line thereof: "nor without the motion therefor being seconded by a majority, as in the case of the previous question."

Mr. MAYNARD. In order that that amendment may be understood it will be necessary that Rule 145 be read, which, it will be observed, relates to motions to suspend the rules.

The Clerk read Rule 145, as proposed to be amended, as follows:

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor; nor shall any rule be suspended, except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present; nor without the motion therefor being seconded by a majority, as in the case of the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. Gentlemen will see that the effect of that will be to require that a motion to suspend the rules shall be seconded by a majority of the House, as a call for the previous question has to be now.

It seems to me that this is a proposition which hardly requires discussion or consideration. It will not operate in any other way than this: that when a proposition is made to suspend the rules, it must command the assent of a majority before the question is formally put, just as in the case of the previous question.

Mr. WOOD. I differ entirely with the gentleman from Tennessee as to the effect of this change in the rules. It strikes me that this is but an additional impediment in the way of the minority in offering any resistance whatever to any measure which the majority may, in their judgment, see proper to pass. As the rules now stand, it requires a two-thirds vote to suspend them. That gives to the majority of this House, as it is now constituted, absolute control over legislation, so far as this House is concerned. Now, this proposition to change the rules provides that, before we can proceed to vote in a legitimate manner on a proposition to suspend the rules, it shall be seconded by a majority of the House. Or, in other words, it is for the purpose of interposing an additional obstacle to giving the minority an opportunity to vindicate their rights, or to explain by their votes upon the record their position in the affirmative or in the negative upon any proposition that the majority might make. Now, I submit to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] and I submit to this House, that, being constituted politically with a two-thirds majority, why should they attempt to deprive the small minority of the right which has always been accorded to the minority in every legislative body in the world? I hope, therefore, that this innovation upon the rules will not be adopted, but that they will be left to stand as they are now.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] clearly misapprehends entirely the object and purpose of this proposed change in the rules.

Mr. WOOD. I am speaking of the effect, not of the object of it.

Mr. GARFIELD. And of the effect also. The effect of the change is not to deprive the minority of any rights they now have. Not only does it not deprive them of any right they now have, but it shields the minority against any abuse they may now be subject to, unless this very amendment be made.

Mr. WOOD. How?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will show the gentleman how. As the rule now stands, the minority might be desirous of getting something done on a day when suspensions of the rules are in order. Any one of the majority of 200 members can prevent their having an opportunity to do so in this way; some one of the minority will be likely to be recognized by the Chair, and when thus recognized, upon submitting his proposition, one-fifth of the members can compel the calling of the roll, which now takes three-quarters of an hour to complete, and thus have the whole time of the House wasted, when there might be something for adoption which a majority of the House would agree to. In other words, if I can get one-fifth of the members present here to join with me, I can compel the yeas and nays to be called and a record made of the votes of the whole body of 293 members on any proposition I or any one else may offer for a suspension of the rules. Now, would it be anything but just that this amendment of the rules shall be interposed between me and my rights, and that I should be called upon to show that a majority of the House wanted the rules suspended before I should have the right to so take up the time of the House? And if I could not do that, why shall I have the right, if I can get one-fifth of the votes to join with me, to take up forty-five minutes of the House upon a proposition to suspend the rules?

Mr. ELDREDGE. Why should not the members of the House be put upon record so that their position may be known? You cannot debate a question under a motion to suspend the rules. Therefore, I answer the gentleman that the object is to make a record, and that is the reason it should be done.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman means merely that he wants to put it in the power of much less than a majority on this floor to take three-quarters of an hour of the time of the House during suspension day, for the mere purpose of taking up time and delaying legislation, then I think the gentleman is asking something that his associates would not agree to. We now have a large House; it takes forty-five minutes to get through the roll-call. With the reading of the Journal unusually long, and with the long time that is taken up by the roll-call, I see that it will be impossible for us to get through the legislation necessary this winter, unless something be done reasonably and fairly to save time which has heretofore been wasted, and which will be more than wasted if we do not, in some way or other, try to prevent it.

The Committee on the Rules wanted to adopt a proposition, suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] a member of the Committee on the Rules, to have the Journal printed and laid upon the tables of members, and providing that within one hour after that had been done, if any member wished to make a correction of the Journal it should be in order to move it; at the end of one hour the Journal should stand approved as printed unless some corrections were suggested. But the Journal clerk tells us that it would be impossible for him to prepare the Journal in time to have it printed by the next morning. Therefore that method of saving time has been found to be impracticable. This method now proposed is reasonable; it will save time and will not interfere, so far as I can see, with the rights of anybody on the floor. If I thought it would I certainly would not vote for it.

Mr. WOOD. I think the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in his explanation, has fully sustained the objection made to the proposed change of the rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] will allow me to ask a question, so that I can understand what is now proposed to be done.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to repeat my objection to this proposed change, in view of the remarks and comments which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has made. I stated that this change would result in an obstruction of the rights of the minority here; that it was designed to throw an additional impediment and obstruction in the way of the minority having an opportunity to place themselves on record against any measure which in their judgment should not be passed. The gentleman has admitted that by saying that he wanted to save time by this proposed change of rules; and that time is to be saved at the expense of the right which we now possess under the rules to record our vote. Therefore, I must say I regret exceedingly that the other side of the House, with their overwhelming majority, should find it necessary to resort to this process of choking off all opposition whatever. I hope the proposed change in our rules will not be made.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say a word, and to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] a question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will hear the gentleman's "word," and also his "question."

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that this proposed rule would be of no great practical consequence, except during the last ten days of the session; and then its effect would be simply that, if a motion to suspend the rules should fail to command a majority of votes, the yeas and nays could not be called. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether the result would not practically be that a minority of the House could never obtain the record by the yeas and nays upon any subject, unless they could induce some portion of the majority to cooperate with them. Is not that the effect of the proposition? I hope the gentleman will explain.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman before me [Mr. O'BRIEN] wants to ask a question. I will answer both gentlemen at the same time.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to illustrate the effect of this proposed rule. Under the existing rule I may have a resolution—for instance, a resolution of inquiry—upon which I desire the action of the House; and, moving a suspension of the rules to adopt the resolution, I can demand the yeas and nays upon the motion, and even though I know the resolution will be defeated, yet if one-fifth of the members present should consent to order the yeas and nays, I can obtain a record in that form. But if the rules be amended, as proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, then, in such a case as I have stated, unless I can get a majority of the House to second the demand for the previous question so that my resolution may be entertained, I can get no record whatever and the country will get no information as to who are or are not willing to order the inquiry proposed by the resolution. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether that is or is not a practical illustration of the operation of this proposition?

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, it is not presumed that gentlemen come here for the purpose of wasting public time upon questions and propositions which they know have nothing in them, which can be interposed only for the sake of delay—propositions which have no practical vitality, but which merely seek to ventilate or air the opinions of those submitting the propositions. No gentleman, I suppose, will for a moment maintain that such is the object for which his constituents have sent him here. If he wishes his constituents or the country to know his opinions on such matters, he has a very easy method of communicating with the country at large or with his constituents. We are sent here for the purpose of legislating in the interest of the country, for its development and growth. The increasing extent of its interests requires, as we all know, all the time that we have to give to it.

Now, sir, whenever any measure comes before us, a fifth of the members present, if they desire the yeas and nays, have the right under the Constitution to require them to be taken. We provide by our rules that on Monday of each week, and during the last ten days of the session, the rules may be suspended by a vote of two-thirds. We have also a provision that debate may be suspended by what is called the previous question, that being a decision whether deliberation shall cease and voting begin, the question being settled ordinarily previous to the vote on the main question. Without such a rule as we have on this subject, the previous question and the yeas and nays thereon might be constantly demanded by any one man who chose to interpose obstacles in the way of deliberation; but the House, for reasons which I presume are understood by every one—reasons which our every-day experience enforces—has decided that no such motion shall be put to a decision by yeas and nays unless it be seconded by a majority of the members present.

Now, then, if any gentleman has a measure which he regards as of such consequence that the rules of the House should be suspended and immediate action had upon it, let him appeal to the House, in the first place, and see whether he can get a majority vote; because if he cannot it is utterly idle to suppose that he could ever get two-thirds to vote with him.

This is a proposition that will save time and will protect the rights of minorities. It will prevent our Monday mornings and the last ten days of the session from being consumed upon impracticable measures when there are measures of real importance upon which, if the House could get at them, it would act favorably. It seemed to the committee (and they were unanimous on this question) that this was a wise provision, calculated to facilitate the public business and protect the rights of everybody while interfering with the just privileges of none.

I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. This resolution to amend the rules in the manner proposed strikes me as a very serious matter. I remember very well, Mr. Speaker, that some years ago, when your predecessor was in the chair, this House adopted a rule providing that while a motion to suspend the rules was pending but one motion to adjourn should be entertained; and, according to the ruling of the Speaker at that time, after one motion to adjourn had been negatived another such motion could not be entertained, though thereby the House might be kept together during the natural lives of all the individuals constituting it. I remember, sir, that when you took the chair you saw the absurdity of such a construction, and held otherwise, Hence we do not always know the effect of a rule by merely reading it. It is only by its use we become acquainted with its effect. I trust gentlemen do not wish further to limit the powers of the minority. They have power now to close the mouths of the minority on any question they bring here for our votes. They may by demanding and seconding the previous question against the will of the minority pass any measure they please without allowing a single word of debate. This, it seems to me, ought to be sufficient. On a motion to suspend the rules no debate is allowed. The vote is the only record which can be made of the opinions of a gentleman, and gentlemen must see, even if the committee did adopt this report unanimously, that the effect will be to deprive the minority of the privilege they have had of making a motion to suspend the rules in order to record their judgments on the questions which have been passed by the majority under suspension of the rules or under operation of the previous question; and the gentleman from Ohio is bold enough to avow that to be their object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all, sir.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That the effect of it is to save time. It is, therefore, to put more completely the minority in the hands of the majority. Let this rule be passed over for to-day. The rules require, in order to change any rule, that one day's notice shall be given. Let us look this thing over and see what will be the effect of it. We may get a rule here which we will all regret, as we did once before. I think the majority ought to be satisfied with its power now without arrogating to itself further powers.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman from New York is so good-natured in his appeal that I will yield to him.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee ought to yield to me. He ought not to seek to change the practice of this House, established for fully fifty years, without some chance for full and fair discussion. I agree this change in the rules is in the direction of facilitating legislation. My first impression was in favor of the change. It also adds to the action necessary to pass a measure under a suspension of the rules, by requiring a majority vote previous to the requisite two-thirds vote; but this, if the measure is to pass, is of little importance. On the other hand, the practical working of the improved rule will sometimes be to abridge the exercise by the minority of the House of this constitutional right of calling the yeas and nays when one-fifth of the members shall demand it.

But, beyond this, my further objection to the proposed rule is exactly founded on the ground upon which gentlemen advocate it here. This is because it will tend to facilitate legislation, and to facilitate legislation just when it will be desirable to prevent it. In this compound Government of ours, in which this Congress legislates about national matters, and the States generally have left to them local matters, it was the wise policy of those who preceded us here and framed the rules and practice of this House that checks should be put upon the action of the majority of the House. From the very nature of business, the necessary public measures, such as the appropriation bills, and the great ways and means bills, and other kindred measures which Congress must pass upon, cannot be passed without considerable delay, because there must be postponements for estimates, reports, investigations, debates, amendments, conferences, and the like.

But these necessary measures, while extending over a considerable period, would not occupy all the time of Congress. During those periods the Congress is left to be pestered with private bills and measures of local and special legislation, and every other form of legislation which is vicious; and the present rules do good, not only by protecting the rights of the minority, but also by enabling time to be consumed to prevent vicious legislation; so that the calling of the yeas and nays is often the best employed time in this House. I have heard gentlemen upon both sides of the House over and over again, during my service in this House, declare, in answer to some remarks about the yeas and nays, that it was the best employed time of the House. I have heard this stated nearly as often, Mr. Speaker, on the other side of the House as I have heard it on mine.

And when especially is it the best employed time? In the very last ten days of the session, when jobs are being crowded through under the suspension of the rules, and when the calling of the yeas and nays, by consuming time, is often an effectual obstacle to wrong or corrupt legislation. Into those last ten days of legislation are concentrated most of the jobs, the iniquities, and the blunders of the session. Why, sir, has not the President of the United States himself just sent a recommendation to this House that no legislation should take place in the last ten days of the session? And yet on the heels of that wise recommendation the Committee on the Rules come in here and seek to restrict the minority for the time being in their opportunities of calling the yeas and nays during those ten days when they may thereby prevent such jobs being put through. I am against the change in the rule, from beginning to end.

Mr. G. F. HOAR rose.

Mr. MAYNARD. I had agreed to yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. Let the gentleman from Massachusetts go ahead.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It seems to me that the position of the gentleman from New York is in violation of the fundamental principles upon which this Constitution of ours is founded; that is the principle of government by the majority, by the will of the majority expressed through their Representatives. A practice has grown up in this House which, in my judgment, speaking for one, is itself clearly a violation of the Constitution, and which ought never to have been sustained in the beginning; by which at any time one-fifth of the House, perverting the constitutional privilege of having the yeas and nays called, intended to inform the people how their Representatives voted on particular measures of legislation, can at any time prevent legislation by the House. It, is therefore, under the construction which has for many years been given to the rules of the House, in the power of any party in this country to substitute for the constitutional legislation, by a majority, legislation by four-fifths. Now, an amendment of the rules, adopted at the last session, required very properly——

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman permit me to remind him that——

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I would rather be allowed to make my argument consecutively without interruption.

Mr. WOOD. I wish to suggest to the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to be interrupted.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Now, I am aware that by an amendment of the rules, recently adopted, this House provided that when a motion to suspend the rules was made, but one motion to adjourn—that is, but one mere filibustering motion—should be entertained and put to the House. And therefore the evil has been so far remedied that we have at last substituted a government by two-thirds for a government by four-fifths; and that is all we have gained. Now, the American people have established a Constitution which provides for a government by a majority, and although it be true that in such a government jobs, wrong-doing, hasty, and erroneous legislation may take place, I do not think any gentleman calling himself a democrat will stand in the face of the American people and say that your remedy for those things is to put the powers of this Government in the hands of any number of persons less than a majority of its people. But under the present rule, during the last ten days of the session, it is in the power of one-fifth of the members of this House by moving to suspend the rules and then calling the yeas and nays, on one motion to suspend the rules after another, to deprive the majority of this House, and thereby the majority of the American people, of the privilege of making their own laws.

Mr. POTTER. Not unless the Speaker gives the floor for a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The Speaker cannot help giving the floor. No matter what motion may be pending, however important, however necessary, however desired by the people, any gentleman may get up and, if he obtains the floor from the Speaker, he may move to suspend the rules to have recorded the opinions of this House on the question of limited monarchy, or the question of the policy pursued by the Khan of Tartary.

The pending motion will be a motion to suspend the rules, which can, of course, be carried only by a two-thirds vote, but one-fifth can demand the yeas and nays on such motions. The power of this House to legislate does not exist during the last ten days of the session of Congress, in accordance with the rules as they stand to-day.

Mr. WOOD. The Constitution gives one-fifth of the House the right to have the yeas and nays entered on the Journal, and a majority cannot take away that right.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. But it was intended by the Constitution that that should be a right to have recorded the votes of legislators on pending measures of legislation, and not to put it in the power of gentlemen like the gentleman from New York to filibuster, and thereby defeat the will of the American people. There are gentlemen on this floor who have seen the gentleman from New York occupy the time of this House for three days by filibustering designed to deprive the majority of the American people of the self-government secured to them by the Constitution. Now, this amendment of the rules simply enacts that whenever a motion to suspend the rules, which must require a two-thirds vote of the House to pass it, cannot get a majority of the House in its favor on a vote seconding the demand for the previous question, that measure shall not be further submitted to the House. That is all.

Mr. POTTER. I wish to ask the gentleman one question. The gentleman says that under a democratic government the majority should rule. I would ask the gentleman if the wisest part of democratic government is not that which limits the powers of legislation?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Undoubtedly; and they are limited in a thousand ways. But the government of a majority of the American people is the government established by our people.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. I did not dream for a moment that by a rule of the House we should interfere with the constitutional rights of Representatives here; and if I thought this rule would so interfere I am free to say I would be against it. But I look upon this rule simply as a facility in the proper conduct of the business of the House, and not in any manner, as far as I am able to see, abridging the right of one-fifth of the House to call the yeas and nays on any question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will not consume any more time. I presume the House understands the question. Certainly the proposed rule was not conceived in any hostility to the Constitution or to anybody's rights under it. I demand the previous question.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a question of order. The rules require that they shall not be amendable without a day's notice.

The SPEAKER. Three days' notice has been given of this. It was introduced and referred to the committee. The Journal clerk says two days.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does the Chair hold that the introduction of this amendment and its reference to the committee was notice to the House when the committee brings it in?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; even more than if it had been merely recorded in the Journal, which it is presumed, although the Chair knows it is a violent presumption, that members listen to it when it is read. This was more than that, for it was read in open House, and was the strongest form of notice that could be given.

Mr. POTTER. I rise to another parliamentary inquiry. Is not the existing rule on this subject the one that was adopted in 1822?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it may have been.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair, and it is whether it does not require a two-thirds vote to pass this amendment?

The SPEAKER. Not on a motion to amend the rules, but only on a motion to suspend them.

Tellers were ordered upon seconding the previous question, and Mr. MAYNARD and Mr. WOOD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 106, noes 58.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. RANDALL, I would like to move to recommit this resolution if the effect of it is, as some gentlemen seem to think, to abridge the constitutional right of the House to call the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot conceive how it can effect that. The motion to recommit is not in order after the previous question has been seconded.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent to move to recommit.

Mr. RANSIER. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POTTER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair gives notice now, in anticipation of dilatory motions, that at the beginning of the session the Chair advised the House that, under the amended rules, dilatory motions would not be admitted; but, of course, a motion to adjourn is in order.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a belief here that this rule will operate to affect the constitutional rights of the minority of the House; and I again appeal to the House to allow me by unanimous consent to make a motion to recommit the rule.

Mr. KASSON. I would like to ask the Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Rules, whether this rule is intended to go, or does go, beyond the point of simply requiring a majority to second the motion before the yeas and nays shall be taken on a motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. If the House desires it, the Chair will explain the operation of this rule if it shall be adopted. The Chair will explain precisely its operation.

Mr. KASSON. On this point, that it will not prevent the calling of the yeas and nays on the resolution itself, but only on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. But in the way in which the resolution is construed you could never get the question before the House on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The House is aware that when a gentleman demands the previous question the question of ordering the main question cannot be submitted to the House until the previous question is seconded. This simply requires a second, and of course no constitutional right will be interfered with, because the question is not before the House. The rule only proposes to apply to the suspension of the rule, the same thing that applies now to ordering the previous question. If a gentleman introduces a proposition to suspend the rules it requires a two-thirds vote to adopt it. This rule would require that before a motion to suspend the rules shall be submitted it shall be seconded by a majority of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. And we cannot demand the yeas and nays upon it without the consent of the majority of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I again ask unanimous consent to submit a motion to recommit this rule.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will not object. I think our friends on the other side of the House are wholly mistaken about the effect of the rule as amended. But I am unwilling to be placed in the attitude of forcing them to a vote which they think is in derogation of their rights, and I ask that the resolution shall be recommitted, so that they may have time to consider it.

Mr. POTTER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, during the last ten days of the session, if this change in the rule be made, it would enlarge the time for legislation?

Mr. GARFIELD. I think it will make it possible to get through the necessary legislation instead of compelling it to be blocked; or, as is now the case, that the Speaker must find out what any gentleman is going to offer before he recognizes him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the question of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. I asked the gentleman from Ohio whether the effect of this change in the rule, if adopted, would not be to enlarge the power of legislation in the House during the last ten days of the session; I mean the practical scope and facility of legislation.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair, and it is whether if this rule were adopted its effect would not be this, that if every member of the minority side of the House were to desire to suspend the rules no such motion could be made unless they could get some portion of the opposition to co-operate with them?

Mr. MAYNARD. I would suggest to the gentleman that every motion that is made in this House in good faith would command the assent of a majority of the House for a second. If not, I suppose that the gentleman would be content it should fall through. But I admit that we have had enough of motions made, not in good faith, but for buncombe and for delay merely.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would inquire of the gentleman whether, if one member on this side of the House should move a suspension of the rules, and all the other members on this side of the House were desirous of having that done, could that motion be got before the House, under the proposed amendment of the rules, without the co-operation of some members on the other side?

Mr. MAYNARD. I am sure if any gentleman—I do not care whether he be a democrat or not—should bring forward a meritorious measure he would get a majority with him to bring it before the House for a vote.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman who objected to this recommittal will withdraw his objection. Everything so far done in the Committee on Rules for this sessson, and I believe it was the same during the last Congress, when I was also a member of the Committee on Rules, has been done by the unanimous consent of the committee. Now, as one of the members of that committee, representing a minority of the House, I appeal to that gentleman to allow that same unanimity of action to continue; to allow this report to be recommitted, in order that we may provide that nothing shall be done to interfere with the constitutional right of one-fifth of the members here to have the yeas and nays called, and, perhaps, at the same time frame the rule so as to facilitate the transaction of business.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The minority of the House is evidently in earnest in this matter, and honest in their objections to the proposed change of the rules. I hope this report will be recommitted for further consideration. I really think something is due to the minority here. After four years' experience in this House I feel like saying that the minority is entitled to respect, because it has seldom resorted to what is called filibustering in relation to any wholesome legislation. I feel that sincerely; and in regard to a proposition of this kind, that has evidently aroused candid and honest objection, I, for one, hope that, because we have a majority of two-thirds or more, we will not seek to force it upon a minority that has not sought heretofore to make itself objectionable.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to the fact that whereas a rule of the House gives to members the privilege, on Monday morning on the second call of States, to offer in turn from each State one bill for immediate consideration, that privilege was retained with the first member who offered a bill from the State of Maine during last Congress, and a wholesome measure of civil rights, in which so large a number of our fellow-citizens are interested, was prevented from being brought to a vote from the beginning of Congress until within a week or two of the end.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That bill was introduced under the call of States; it had nothing to do whatever with the suspension of the rules. If I introduced it, I did so for the purpose of putting it through as speedily as possible.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman did not introduce it; it was his colleague, Mr. FRYE.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. O, the gentleman refers to the civil rights bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I am speaking of filibustering. I did not speak of any particular form of filibustering. When the gentleman says that in his experience no wholesome measure of legislation has been defeated by filibustering, I remind him that this great measure, about which he and I, I have no doubt, are in full accord, was prevented for two years from being brought to a vote by sheer filibustering.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There was no filibustering against the proposition to which the gentleman refers. I was the one who took charge of the matter on this side of the House during that time. We resorted to only the legitimate means by which legislation can be correctly done, calling for the reading of bills as they were introduced. There was no filibustering; no motions to adjourn; no motions for a suspension of the rules. But when the States were called for bills for reference, we insisted upon the reading of a sufficient number of them to exhaust the time allowed for that purpose. That was the only way that bill was kept from being passed.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That was my recollection.

Mr. MAYNARD. As the organ of the Committee on the Rules, I have brought forward this proposition to the House and have invoked their action upon it. I have indulged gentlemen in a very wide latitude of discussion. All this discussion is now proceeding out of order. I could not consent that we shall have what appears to be intended, but which I am sure is not—crimination on the one side and recrimination on the other. That is carrying the measure of liberality beyond what I think is required.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to say that I thought gentlemen on the other side were laboring under a total misapprehension as to the object of this proposed change in the rule, and I wanted simply to assure them that it was not in spirit, or in purpose, or in effect calculated to injure the rights of the minority at all. And rather than they should vote under such a misapprehension, I was in favor of delay. But gentlemen have assured me they understood it fully; and if so, they are qualified to vote on it now as well as they ever will be.

Mr. HOLMAN. This amendment will have this effect: that one-fifth even shall not have the power to delay a measure for the time being, during the last ten days of the session. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] if he has not known some of the most dangerous and iniquitous measures defeated by this means?

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the Chair if this proposed change of the rules will in any degree interfere with the power of making dilatory motions, commonly known as filibustering?

The SPEAKER. The Chair dislikes to enter into any discussion of the rules; it is his province only to construe them.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to know the opinion of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. It has no relation to filibustering.

Mr. POTTER. I have never sought to filibuster since I had a seat in this House, except when it has been attempted to rush through under a suspension of the rules, and without debate, important and unprinted bills, which, when they are long bills and contain important legislation, should never be allowed to pass until they can be examined; such, for instance, as was the bill of last session to let the Baltimore and Potomac Railway pass through the Park and take the lands at Sixth street, and other extreme measures like that.

In submitting my motion to now adjourn I know I cannot long defeat action on this change of rules, but I seek to put upon record thereby, in the most solemn way, my conviction that this is an attempt, contrary to the wise admonition recently given by the President, to enlarge, instead of restricting, that most fraudulent and dangerous legislation which often characterizes the last ten days of a congressional session.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this proposition will not affect at all the legislation of the last ten days of the session, so far as regards the rights of the minority to filibuster, to make dilatory motions, to interpose propositions for the purpose of delay.

Mr. POTTER. Why, sir, the gentleman knows that when a motion to suspend the rules is pending, but one dilatory motion can be interposed. That has been stated but a moment ago by the Chair.

Mr. GARFIELD. But this very measure will obstruct the exercise of the power to suspend the rules, and will thus constitute a still further means of delay.

Mr. POTTER. By substituting the previous question—taking five minutes instead of a thirty-minutes call of the yeas and nays!

Mr. ELDREDGE. Gentlemen on the other side ought to be content with having a Speaker of their own choice and a majority of more than two-thirds. The Speaker must always determine whom he will recognize on a motion to suspend the rules. The whole power in that respect is in his hands; and it is only by virtue of his generosity or his justice that we ever get the opportunity to make even such a motion. The Chair, in determining whom he will recognize, will act hereafter, as he has always done heretofore, in the manner he thinks best and wisest; and certainly gentlemen on the other side cannot complain that he has been too partial toward us. In addition to this power exercised by the Speaker of their own choice the other side have, as I remarked, a majority of more than two-thirds, so that they can suspend the rules whenever they please; they have no difficulty in obtaining the recognition of the Speaker under the rules as they now stand. In the name, then, of common sense and common justice, what necessity is there for changing a rule which has stood so long and has been found to work so well? If there is any time when we ought to have the means of delaying hasty and inconsiderate legislation it is during the last ten days of the session. It is then that such resolutions as we have heard referred to are passed through, without members knowing what they are voting upon. I think that if there is any proper and beneficial check upon legislation it is the rule under which the minority have been able to call the attention of the House and of the country to bills coming before us during those ten days of utter confusion at the end of the session.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will make a single suggestion to my friend from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] and before doing so I will certify here in my place, if the certificate will be accepted by him, that I do not believe he ever does anything in this House which he does not think, as a Representative of the people, he ought to do. But I will submit to him that the trouble in the latter part of the session is not with bills that pass under a suspension of the rules or by a majority vote. The trouble is with measures that pass unanimously—measures to which nobody objects because nobody has time specially to examine them. Some gentleman who has had given to him, perhaps, a very imperfect description of a measure makes a statement to the House, and makes it, perchance, in good faith, or it may be that no statement is made, and the bill goes through unanimously without any opposition. It is in this way that objectionable bills are passed, though they are much fewer than is generally supposed. The case in this respect is very much as it was put in this Hall many years ago. One addled egg finding its way into the pudding, no number of new eggs can make it sweet. So a single bad measure passed in the last days of the session is trumpeted to the world as a sample of our legislation, and I am sorry to say we are in this way too often subjected to unjust criticism.

Mr. POTTER. That is true, Mr. Speaker; but it is also true that most of the private bills (the private calendar from the Senate, and all that class of legislation) get crowded into the last ten days of the session; and therefore it is just during those last ten days, when by your two-thirds vote you can suspend the rules, choke off debate, and rush anything through, that the right to secure time in the interest of honest legislation by calling the yeas and nays is most important.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman desire us still to have the unalloyed and unrestricted right to force the two-thirds rule upon the minority at any time without their having any chance for a preliminary vote to ascertain whether the demand for a suspension of the rules is seconded? We are now proposing to give him and others of the minority the power to thwart or delay the proceedings under a two-thirds vote, and yet the gentleman is protesting against this additional power which we propose to put into his hands.

Mr. HOLMAN. For fifty years the majority of this House has sustained the present rule on this subject, and all we ask is the continuance of the rule which has governed this House for fifty years.

Mr. MAYNARD. Gentlemen on the other side talk about "the minority" in this House as though they monopolized the minority. Why, sir, only yesterday I found myself in the minority on the salary bill. I introduced an amendment which I thought eminently proper and wise. I attempted to get a majority of the House with me, but failed. So that we, all of us, find ourselves in the minority on some question, almost every day. I then accepted the situation, and I trust gentlemen will do the same thing now.

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman was then only in the minority for the time being, while I allude to the recognized minority upon this floor on great party questions.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Speaker, I believe that our side of the House ought to agree to the recommittal of this resolution to the Committee on the Rules, especially as there seems to be some misunderstanding as to what the resolution does precisely.

Mr. DEWITT. We on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, have a minority of less than one-third, composed chiefly of new members, and I appeal to the magnanimity of the two-thirds majority of the House not to incorporate this change in a very important rule, which is as old as March 13, 1822, without some further examination. We have not had any opportunity—at least I have not had, and I presume a majority of the new members of the minority have not—to examine this rule and the proposed change. I appeal, then, as a new member of this House, and a new member of the minority, to the magnanimity of the two-thirds majority of the House not to do this without further deliberation.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Is a motion to recommit to the committee in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, unless the motion to adjourn be withdrawn.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York a question in order to come to a correct understanding of his position in reference to one point. I have listened to the debate, and understand what he has said, except about the last ten days of the session. I understood him to say that he opposes this proposed change, because it deprives the minority of the right to demand the yeas and nays on questions affecting legislation in any way.

Mr. POTTER. I did, and for the reason I gave.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say I differ with him there, because it is a simple question whether they shall give a man that process as on the demand for the previous question. I wished yesterday, or the day before, to have the yeas and nays on the previous question, but I could not get them under the rule. I look upon this as one of the same kind, depriving members of the power to call up a question here on points affecting its passage unless the majority vote to take it up by a suspension of the rules. There is where I differ with the gentleman. If it were a proposition to deprive anybody of the right to call the yeas and nays, having the requisite number, I should be opposed to it. I wish to say, simply, the point I have been looking at is this: On our side of the House, as well as on that side, frequently a member gets up and puts a political conundrum at us which he words in his own peculiar way and will not allow an opportunity for amendment, but demands we shall vote yea or nay on the very language in which he puts it, when it does not affect one single item of the legislation of the country. Now, I should be glad to see some such rule applied to such idle movements not at all affecting legislation. But I do not wish to touch the right of members to have the yeas and nays on any substantial legislative question.

Mr. POTTER. I thank the gentleman from Iowa for his explanation. I agree with him in what he has said concerning resolutions introduced here, where the preamble declares one way and the resolution itself another way, so that every member is embarrassed how to vote. For myself I frequently refuse to vote on such political conundrums. But in the last ten days of the session we are not subject to that sort of thing, because the Speaker never recognizes anybody with conundrums in his pocket.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say that if this change of the rule does that which the gentleman seems to think it does in reference to the last ten days of the session, I would agree to recommit the resolution to the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York withdraw the motion to adjourn?

Mr. POTTER. I do.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I withdraw my objection to the recommittal of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the resolution will be recommitted to the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded.

The motion was agreed to.

The resolution was then recommitted to the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was recommitted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 215) in relation to the printing of the Biennial Register, commonly called the Blue Book;

A bill (S. No. 191) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels;" and

A bill (S. No. 216) to change the name of the pleasure yacht Fearless

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. R. No. 16) providing for a change in the name and title of the agent and consul-general of the United States at Alexandria.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to offer a privileged resolution. I have been given to understand that if we send over to the other branch another resolution for a recess it may be concurred in. I offer another resolution differing from that formerly adopted by the House only in this respect, that we shall reassemble on Monday, the 5th of January, instead of Tuesday, the 6th of January. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses adjourn on the 19th instant they shall stand adjourned until Monday, the 5th of January next.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 124, noes 39.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to make a privileged report. The Committee on the Judiciary have instructed me to report a bill to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.

The bill (H. R. No. 795) was received, and read a first and second time.

The bill provides that whoever, being a corporation or natural person and owner, or in charge of any public inn, or of any place of public amusement or entertainment for which a license from any legal authority is required, or of any line of stage-coaches, railroad, or other means of public carriage of passengers or freight, or of any cemetery or other benevolent institution, or any public school supported in whole or in part at public expense or by endowment for public use, shall make any distinction as to admission or accommodation therein of any citizen of the United States because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000 for each offense; and the person or corporation so offending shall be liable to the citizens thereby injured in damages to be recovered in an action of debt.

The second section provides that offenses under this act, and actions to recover damages, may be prosecuted before any territorial, district, or circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction of crimes at the place where the offense was charged to have been committed, as well as in the district where the parties may reside, as now provided by law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHOEMAKER] to introduce a resolution for reference.

COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, offered a resolution authorizing the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, and the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to employ a clerk jointly; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

NATIONAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

Mr. MAYNARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 796) to establish and maintain a national savings depository as a branch of the Post-Office Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] chairman of the Committee on War Claims, desires to offer a resolution.

Mr. LAWRENCE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and under the law referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on War Claims, and the Commissioner of Claims, one thousand copies of the last report of the Commissioner of Claims, in addition to the number already ordered.

EVIDENCE ON WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on War Claims be, and they are hereby, authorized to send for persons and papers whenever, in the judgment of the said committee, it shall be deemed necessary to obtain additional evidence in regard to any claim before it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object. If it was any particular case I might not object; but the general power I object to.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. DONNAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed of the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the years 1872 and 1873, 255,000 copies of each; 180,000 of each of which shall be for the use of the House, 50,000 of each shall be for the use of the Senate, and 25,000 of each shall be for distribution by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. DONNAN. I move the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing what will be the cost of these copies?

Mr. DONNAN. The entire work is in print, the Senate at its last session having ordered twenty-two hundred copies for their own use. It will cost something like sixty cents a copy.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire, then, to ask the gentleman what, in the view of his committee and himself, would be the value to this House of giving us that very large number of copies of books, with no provision yet made for the distribution of them? We cannot tell whether there will be any law in reference to that matter passed, and I suggest to him that it would be better to wait before incurring this expense until we determine whether we will have any arrangement for the distribution of documents. One of the great reasons assigned on this floor for abolishing the franking privilege was to prevent the printing of such large masses of these public documents.

Mr. DONNAN. I reply to the gentleman from Ohio that this resolution will give each member, for distribution, a little more than one hundred copies less than the average number in the last Congress. We propose to print only the usual number, and it is to be divided among the increased representation, so that it will only give to each member for distribution somewhere in the neighborhood of six hundred copies. I will say further, that, in the opinion of the Committee on Printing, there is no document printed by the Government which is so greatly in demand as is the document in question, and we believe that, whatever economy may be exercised with regard to other public documents, it is right that the largest number of this document should be printed for distribution throughout the country.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Iowa to say that this work is already stereotyped, so I suppose there is no hurry in regard to ordering the printing of additional copies for distribution. No provision has yet been made by law for the distribution of public documents, and it seems to me unwise for us to order this printing until Congress has provided by law in respect to their distribution. I suppose some project will be presented to the House soon, or during the present session, concerning the distribution of public documents; and why not wait until some such measure has passed into legislation? It is well known that documents that have been heretofore printed have been printed at great cost to the Government, and that many of them are entirely useless; those to whom they are sent never read them; they simply go into the waste-paper basket.

Now I hold, so far as I am concerned, and I think my constituents will agree with me, that no public documents ought to be printed by Congress, unless it may be a small number required for the public libraries of the country, until those who want them are willing to pay for such documents the actual cost to the Government of printing and transmitting them through the mails. Why cannot such a project as this meet with favor in this House: that these documents if printed at all, shall be printed, and a circular, stating what documents are printed, and their cost, be sent by the Departments to every post-office in the United States, to be posted in a conspicuous place, where every person can see what documents have been printed by the Government and at what price they can be obtained; and then let those who want them order them and pay for them, and not compel the whole body of the people to pay for documents that only go to one-tenth or one-hundredth or one-thousandth part of the people? Let us not keep up the system of printing documents at the expense of the people, giving them to the few, while the great majority get none, although paying the greater portion of their cost.

I represent what is substantially an agricultural district. Probably ten thousand of the voters in the district are farmers. I have had for distribution annually between seven and eight hundred copies of these agricultural reports, and can thus send one to every fourteenth or fifteenth farmer in my district. Now, why should the fourteen farmers be taxed both for the printing of and the postage on documents sent to the fifteenth man? Can any gentleman give me a good reason for it? Why should all the people of the country be taxed for the printing and distribution of the census reports? The members of this House received forty or fifty sets of those large volumes of the census report to distribute among their constituents. Those who had that number of public libraries in their districts doubtless sent them to such libraries, and thus distributed them wisely; but those who sent them to individuals whom they selected to show that special favor to—ten, twenty, thirty, or forty individuals in their districts—sent them a valuable public document, a valuable present, at the expense of all their constituents. Now, there is no justice, no equity, no good sense in such a distribution of these publications; and, instead of it, I am in favor of providing that the documents printed at the public expense shall be sent only to those of the people who want them, and who are willing to pay for them.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I suggest to the gentleman from Vermont that it does not cost the people anything to carry these documents through the mails. The abolishing of the franking privilege has not saved one single cent to the people of this country.

Mr. DONNAN. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, I am much obliged to the chairman of the Committee on Printing for yielding to me for a few moments. It seems to me that it is not proper for the House to make large orders for printing books at this time. Undoubtedly some measure must be adopted for the distribution of those documents which have already been printed, or which have already been ordered during the present session of Congress to be printed. Already the rooms for public documents are piled full of books which members have not had any opportunity, since the franking privilege was abolished, to distribute.

Some measure for the free distribution of the documents already ordered to be printed should be provided. It would be well, I think, to provide that the Post-Office Department should furnish the various Bureaus of the Government and the two Houses of Congress with the proper stamping-machine to stamp the nature of the matter sent and the amount of postage on it, upon which such matter should pass through the mails and the postage be charged to the Department issuing the matter; so that the Post-Office Department may be able to keep an account of the postage on the Government matter sent, and that matter at the same time be sent to our constituents without charge to their members of Congress. Such was the nature of the bill I introduced to abolish the franking privilege, and which passed this House in the last Congress, and which would, I think, be a wise measure of legislation if the Government is to continue the free publication of books.

But upon that other branch of the question to which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] has well alluded I want also to say a word. I have an agricultural district; I distribute all my quota of agricultural reports; I generally try to get more; and I have found the result of the practice heretofore in operation was to secure a very unsatisfactory distribution of public documents. One man comes here as a member of Congress and sends his agricultural reports, for instance, to certain persons in his district; another man comes here in his stead and sends his documents the next year to another set of persons.

Thus it happens that no one person in the district gets a complete set of any documents, so that their value is largely lost. I think on the whole that it would be more useful to have the Government print a certain number of those documents that may be of public use, and allow any citizen to get them upon paying the mere cost price of printing them. If there is an agricultural report, a mechanical report, or a report on the improvement of rivers and harbors or any other subject of value, any citizen who wants it can thus have it by sending to the printing office the mere cost of printing it. That is the system which is found to work best in Great Britain. It is one free from the objections suggested by the gentleman from Vermont, and I believe would be wiser than the present plan. But however this may be, I insist that it would be improvident now to go on and order the printing of the great mass of books recommended by this resolution, at least until we make some provision for their distribution.

Mr. DONNAN. I am now taking up the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and I feel some delicacy in doing so. I do not think it is necessary to discuss this matter further, for I believe the House recognizes the fact that no document is printed of so much interest and value to the country as this. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OCEAN NATIONAL BANK, NEW YORK.

Mr. SESSIONS, by unanimous consent, submitted a preamble and resolution relative to the Ocean National Bank, of New York City; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

SHIP-CHANNEL BETWEEN LAKES HURON AND ERIE.

Mr. BASS. I ask unanimous consent to submit and have adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to ascertain and report to this House an approximate estimate from present surveys of the expense of deepening and widening the navigable channel of the rivers and waters connecting Lake Huron with Lake Erie, so as to adapt the same to a capacity for practicable navigation of vessels drawing twenty feet of water.

Mr. SPEER. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. This resolution should be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Railways and Canals has charge of the subject.

Mr. CONGER. Surveys have already been made, but no report has been sent in by the Secretary of War or by the Engineer Corps. This resolution will require no further expense or examination; it only asks for an approximate estimate on the present surveys. I hope no objection will be made to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist that, unless there is some special reason for adopting this resolution at this time, it should be referred to the Committee on Commerce or the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. McCRARY. This resolution comes from the Committee on Railways and Canals. It has been considered by that committee; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BASS] was instructed to report it to the House. It involves no expenditure whatever, as I understand.

Mr. HOLMAN. With that explanation, I withdraw my objection.

No further objection being made, the resolution was adopted.

ANNUAL POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. PACKER. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report the annual post-route bill. It has no legislation in it.

The bill (H. R. No. 798) was received, read three times, and passed.

Mr. PACKER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. MOREY. I am instructed by the Committee on the Public Lands to report back the following resolution referred to them, and to ask that it be passed. It is simply a resolution asking for information from the Interior Department in relation to public lands in Missouri:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the House, as early as practicable, as to the numbers of acres of land within the limits of the State of Missouri now unsold and belonging to the United States; second, the number of acres of the sixteenth-section or school lands that have been set apart within said State for school purposes; third, the number of acres within said sixteenth-section or school lands that have not been appropriated to school purposes, or which have been lost to the schools by paramount title of New Madrid claims, Spanish or French grants, or otherwise; and, fourth, the entire number of acres of land within the territorial limits of the State of Missouri.

The resolution was adopted.

MEDICAL HISTORY OF THE WAR.

Mr. FORT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be requested to inqure into and report the cost and practicability of printing ten thousand copies of the Medical History of the Late War.

LEMUEL C. RISLEY.

Mr. NIBLACK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 799) for the relief of Lemuel C. Risley, late a second lieutenant of the Eighty-fifth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ANTONIO PELETIER.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 800) to authorize the President of the United States to request the Republic of Hayti to indemnify Antonio Peletier; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

L. R. STRAUS.

Mr. GLOVER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 801) for the relief of L. R. Straus, of Macon City, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

ARCHIBALD B. RUE.

Mr. DURHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 802) for the relief of Archibald B. Rue; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

BONDED WAREHOUSES FOR CLEANSING RICE.

Mr. SHELDON. The Committee on Ways and Means have directed me to report a bill, which I ask to have put at once upon its passage. I do not believe there will be any objection to it.

The bill (H. R. No. 476) to establish a bonded warehouse for the storing and cleansing of rice intended for exportation, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act importers' bonded warehouses, to be used for the storage and cleansing of imported rice intended for exportation to foreign countries, may be established at any port of entry in the United States, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be considered as ordered to be engrossed, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RAINEY. I would like the gentleman reporting this bill [Mr. SHELDON] to explain it. I do not understand it.

Mr. SHELDON. A good deal of rice comes from the Indies in an unclean condition; and the object of this bill is that such rice may be put in bonded warehouses to be cleaned preparatory to exportation. It is not for local consumption at all.

Mr. RANDALL. Are these bonded warehouses to be paid for in any way by the United States, whether in the form of rent or otherwise?

Mr. SHELDON. I suppose these warehouses would fall under the ordinary regulations of the Treasury Department. I ask that a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject be read. The Committee on Ways and Means were unanimous in favor of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1873.

SIR: Referring to the conversation had with you this morning in regard to the bill introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. POTTER, of New York, to permit the establishment of warehouses for the cleaning of imported rice, in bond for export, I have to say that this Department apprehends no difficulty in preparing such regulations (should said bill become a law) as will entirely prevent frauds upon the revenue in that respect, and at the same time give exporters all the facilities they may be entitled to thereunder.

I am, very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON, Secretary.

Hon. L. A. SHELDON,
House of Representatives.

Mr. RAINEY. I must object to the passage of the bill at this time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think such a bill as this ought to be considered more deliberately than we can consider it now.

The SPEAKER. It is not such a bill as the Committee on Ways and Means are authorized to report at any time. It is not a tax bill. The committee have no authority to report it, except on a regular call, or by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAWES. If the bill were well understood there would be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Objection having been made, the bill is not before the House.

WASHINGTON NAVY-YARD.

Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 803) to increase the facilities for docking, building, and repairing at the navy-yard, Washington, District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. KELLOGG, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 804) in alteration of an act approved March 3, 1873, concerning national banks, &c.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

COPYRIGHT OF PERIODICALS, ETC.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and are, instructed to inquire whether, under existing copyright laws, the publishers of periodicals and newspapers can copyright their respective publications by the payment of one fee to the Librarian of Congress for each volume of a periodical or newspaper, or whether the fee is required for each number published; and if the latter, then that said committee inquire into the expediency of so amending the law as only to require one fee for each volume; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

I present as a reason for this resolution the following letter which I have received:

OFFICE OF GEM OF THE WEST AND SOLDIERS' FRIEND, 448 Wabash Avenue, Chicago, Illinois, November 29, 1873.

DEAR SIR: Previous to 1873 magazine and newspaper publishers could copyright their title by the payment of a single fee. Now, by the construction placed upon the law by A. R. Spofford, (the Librarian of the Congressional Library,) it is held that the law does not cover the title unless each issue is filed with the Librarian of Congress and a separate fee paid each week or month. Many publishers don't care to copyright the matter but only the title. Will you try to have a fair interpretation placed upon the law, by special act or otherwise, for the benefit of such publishers?

Yours, truly,

C. AUGUST HAVILAND.

Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

Mr. CROOKE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 805) to amend an act to further the administration of justice, approved June 1, 1872; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

INDIANS IN MICHIGAN AND INDIANA.

Mr. PACKARD, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of certain Indians residing in Michigan and Indiana; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CORRESPONDENCE BY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 806) to provide for the transmission of correspondence by telegraph; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

POST-ROUTES IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. CROUNSE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have passed now a bill to establish certain post-routes in the State of Nebraska.

The bill was read.

Mr. TYNER. I think this bill had better be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I object to action upon it now.

POST-ROUTE.

Mr. CROUNSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to establish a post-route in the State of Michigan, from Big Prairie to Morgan's Station.

Mr. DEWITT. I have a similar bill.

Mr. CROUNSE. The Department was about to put on service, but found there was no road between the two stations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the bill if there be no objection, but he cannot help remarking that it is a most objectionable mode of legislation.

Mr. RANDALL. We have to-day passed a general post-route bill, which has gone to the Senate, and I would suggest to gentlemen having post-routes bills which they desire to have established, to go to the Senate and have their routes inserted in that general bill.

The SPEAKER. That would be the more expeditious method.

Mr. RANDALL. And I will further remark, in behalf of the Post-Office Committee, that if any one of those gentlemen had gone to that committee and handed in his post-routes, they would have been included in the general bill.

Mr. CROUNSE. That being the case I will withdraw the bill, and have the post-route inserted in the general post-route bill in the Senate.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the following cases, which were referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 232) for the relief of the heirs of Gideon Walker, deceased, late of Indiana—referred to the Committee on War Claims;

A bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of George W. Harding, of Monroe County, Indiana—referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812;

The petition of Samuel Bayley, of Elmore, Vermont, for an invalid pension—referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812; and

The petition of Jonas Warren—referred to the Committee on War Claims.

COGGSWELL & CO.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 807) for the relief of Coggswell & Co., of Saint Louis, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, OHIO.

Mr. JEWETT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 808) to grant to the State of Ohio, for the use and benefit of the Agricultural College at Columbus, the unsold and unappropriated public lands in the State of Ohio, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM MOORE.

Mr. JEWETT, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 809) for the relief of William Moore, late a private in Company K, Seventy-third Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

DELAWARE COUNTY SOLDIERS' MONUMENTAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. TOWNSEND, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 810) to donate four condemned cannon and sixteen cannon balls to the Delaware County Soldiers and Sailors' Monumental Association; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SALT-WORKS, KENTUCKY.

Mr. ADAMS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 811) for the relief of those suffering from the destruction of the salt-works near Manchester, Kentucky, pursuant to the order of Major-General Carlos Buell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 481) making appropriations for extraordinary expenses of the naval service; and

An act (H. R. No. 482) to correct the enrollment of an act entitled "An act for the relief of P. W. Standefer."

COTTON AND OTHER ABANDONED PROPERTY.

Mr. HAYS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to this House the amount of money paid into the Treasury of the United States arising from cotton and other captured and abandoned property; how much has been paid to claimants out of said fund, by what authority the same was so paid, and what amount of said fund still remains in the Treasury.

Mr. DAWES. That resolution should go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HAYS. I think it should pass.

Mr. DAWES. Does it come from the Committee on Claims?

Mr. HAYS. It does not.

Mr. DAWES. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

POST-ROADS.

Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 812) to establish post-roads throughout the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that all railroads and all public highways in each State and Territory, and in the District of Columbia, are hereby established as post-roads.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to that unless it goes to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

HARBOR OF REFUGE.

Mr. SAWYER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, instructed to furnish to this House, at as early a day as practicable, a report of the progress and condition of the work on the harbor of refuge at the mouth of the Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-canal, Wisconsin, at the close of navigation, 1873.

OLIVE S. BREED.

Mr. SAWYER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 813) granting a pension to Olive S. Breed, widow of J. Henry Breed, deceased, late a private in Company K, Fourth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGES OF NAMES OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. MAYNARD, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Banking and Currency the bill (H. R. No. 34) authorizing the Second National Bank of Havana, New York, to change its name, with the recommendation that it do pass with amendments.

The bill was read. It provides that the name of the Second National Bank of Havana, New York, shall be changed to the Havana National Bank of Havana, New York, whenever the board of directors of said bank shall accept the new name by resolution of the board, and cause a copy of such resolution, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency: Provided, That such acceptance be made within six months after the passage of this act.

The second section provides that all debts, demands, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the Second National Bank of Havana shall devolve upon and inure to the Havana National Bank of Havana, New York, whenever such change of name is effected.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In the first section, after the word "board" insert the words "confirmed by a vote of two-thirds of the stockholders."

In the same section, after the word "such" strike out the word "resolution" and insert the word "action."

After the word "act," at the end of the first section, insert "and that all expenses incident to the proposed change, including engraving, shall be borne and paid by said bank."

Mr. MAYNARD. I am asked privately what is the reason of this change. I will state in a word that the present name is a misnomer, there being no first bank recognized at this place. The bill is intended to remedy this solecism, and the committee are unanimous in recommending it.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD also, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Banking and Currency the bill (H. R. No. 418) to authorize the First National Bank of Saint Anthony, Minnesota, to change its location and name, with the recommendation that it do pass with amendments.

The bill was read. It provides that the First National Bank of Saint Anthony, now located in the city of Saint Anthony, county of Hennepin, and State of Minnesota, is hereby authorized to change its location to the city of Minneapolis, in the county and State aforesaid. Whenever the stockholders representing three-fourths of the capital stock of said bank, at a meeting called for that purpose, determine to make such change, the president and the cashier shall execute a certificate, under the corporate seal of said bank, specifying such determination, and shall cause the same to be recorded in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency; and thereupon such change of location shall be effected, and the operations of discount and deposit of said bank shall be carried on in the city of Minneapolis aforesaid.

The second section provides that nothing in the act shall be so construed as in any manner to release the said bank from any liability, or affect any action or proceeding in law in which the said bank may be a party or interested.

The third section provides that whenever the location of the said bank shall have been changed from the city of Saint Anthony to the city of Minneapolis, in accordance with the first section of the act, its name shall be changed to "Merchants' National Bank of Minneapolis," and all debts, demands, liabilities, rights, and powers belonging to said First National Bank of Saint Anthony shall devolve upon and inure to the Merchants' National Bank of Minneapolis; and all actions pending by or against said First National Bank of Saint Anthony may be prosecuted by or against the Merchants' National Bank of Minneapolis in the same manner and with the same effect as if such change of location and name had not been made.

The fourth section provides that as soon as such change of name and location shall have been made, public notice thereof shall be given by publication in a newspaper in both said city of Saint Anthony and said city of Minneapolis, for two weeks successively.

The fifth section provides that the act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The amendments by the committee were read, as follows:

At the end of section 1 insert the following:

"Provided, That such acceptance be made within six months after the passage of this act, and that all expenses incident to the proposed change, including engraving shall be borne and paid by said bank."

Strike out section 5, as follows:

"That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage."

Mr. MAYNARD. It must be obvious that there is no necessity for this last section, as all acts must take effect from their passage unless otherwise provided.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALMONT BARNES.

Mr. HENDEE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 814) for the relief of Almont Barnes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PIEDMONT RAILROAD.

Mr. STOWELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire as to the right, claim and title of the United States in and to the railroad extending from Danville, Virginia, to Greensborough, North Carolina, known as the Piedmont Railroad, and report by bill or otherwise.

METROPOLITAN POLICE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the District of Columbia the joint resolution (H. R. No. 24) relative to the Metropolitan Police of the District of Columbia, and move that the Committee on the District of Columbia be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

There was no objection; and the motion was agreed to.

ACCOUNTS OF THE DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the following resolution, unanimously recommended by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be authorized to employ an accountant for the purpose of a full and exhaustive examination of the accounts of the District government, and of the board of public works, and of the former municipal governments of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and of the District, so far as regards the improvement of streets and avenues, sewerage, water and gas, the expenditures for the same, the amounts appropriated and paid therefor by the Federal Government, and the outstanding indebtedness of the District; said accountant to act under the direction of the committee, to be employed for not more than two months, and his compensation to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that resolution ought to go to the Committee on Accounts. All other resolutions of the same kind have gone there.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Let me say to the House that on the question arising in regard to the expenditure of money in the District of Columbia, and the question as to further appropriations by this House, it was found by the committee to be absolutely indispensable that an accountant, a professional accountant, should go through and examine those accounts under the superintendence of the committee.

The resolution was agreed to.

JANE LA FONT.

Mr. BARBER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 815) granting a pension to Jane La Font, dependent mother of Louis La Font, deceased, private in Company C, Second Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, detailed to Battery D, First Rhode Island Light Artillery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

INVENTORS' UNION.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 816) to incorporate the Inventors and Canvassers' National Union; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

PLEASANT M. CRAIGMILER.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 817) for the relief of Pleasant M. Craigmiler, of Bradley County, East Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS, VIRGINIA.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 818) supplementary to the third section of an act entitled "An act to divide the State of Virginia into two judicial districts;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

WESLEY JAMES.

Mr. WOODWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 819) granting a pension to Wesley James; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT.

Mr. MYERS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 820) granting condemned cannon and cannon-balls to posts of the Grand Army of the Republic, Philadelphia, for monumental purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. ROBBINS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to inquire what legislation is necessary in order to provide for a more equitable distribution of the national currency among the citizens of the several States, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman can only get the Comptroller of the Currency to execute the existing law he will have relief.

The SPEAKER. The resolution was a mere instruction to the committee to inquire into the matter.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

Mr. PACKER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported a bill (H. R. No. 821) to provide for the distribution of public documents printed by authority of Congress, and of seeds furnished by the Agricultural Department, for the free exchange of newspapers between publishers, and for the free transmission of weekly newspapers by mail within the counties where published; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

NEWTON KNIGHT AND OTHERS.

Mr. HOWE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 822) for the relief of Newton Knight and other citizens of Mississippi therein named; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HARBOR OF SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

Mr. SESSIONS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 823) to provide payment for clearing the river and harbor of obstructions at Savannah, Georgia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. HURLBUT. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for adoption at this time:

Resolved, That, in view of the present embarrassed state of the national finances, and the reasonable demand for retrenchment, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to report in favor of no bills for the commencement of work on new public buildings, or the purchase or acquisition of sites for the same, but that their recommendations shall be confined to the economical completion of such public buildings as are now in construction, or under contract for construction, where the stoppage of the work would involve the United States in serious damages, or be clearly prejudicial to the public service.

Mr. NEGLEY. I object.

EMPLOYÉS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. PELHAM. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for adoption at this time:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper, Postmaster, Clerk, and Sergeant-at-Arms of this House be directed without unnecessary delay to report to this House the name, residence and pay of each person in the employ of the Government in the various offices of this House.

Mr. SAWYER and others objected.

RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. ORR submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to certify no lands to any railroad company when such lands are claimed under the homestead or pre-emption laws; and to take no further action in any such cases until the whole subject can be investigated and some general action taken by Congress.

DEBATES OF CONGRESS.

Mr. FRYE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire into the cost of reporting and printing the debates of Congress as the work is now being done; whether it was not more acceptably and economically done by the proprietors of the Globe; whether the permanent establishment of the work at the Government Printing Office will not involve large expenditures for facilities for its prosecution, and to report by bill or otherwise at as early a day as practicable.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. HYDE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 824) to equalize the bounties of soldiers and sailors of the late war; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Having yielded to so many others, I wish now, with the leave of the House, to yield to myself for one moment before I go on with the civil rights bill; and I will say that I do not propose to go on any further with that to-night than to get it in order for debate and action to-morrow.

I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House, upon motion of the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings, [Mr DUELL,] adopted on yesterday a resolution giving that committee a general right to send for persons and papers. I do not think that ought to have been done, but that each committee, when it desires persons and papers to be sent for, should get the authority of the House to send for them in each case.

I now move that the civil rights bill be printed, together with an amendment that has been shown to me by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. MOREY.]

The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I also desire to say that I propose, within the two hours which are allowed to me as chairman of the committee reporting the bill, unless the House desires more time, to give the fullest opportunity for debate, and especially to give opportunity to my friends on the other side to debate the bill.

EXAMINATION OF PRIVATE CORRESPONDENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 10, 1873, relative to allowing any custom-house officer or detective to examine correspondence passing through the New York or Boston post-office.

Mr. DAWES. I move that that communication be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. Why to that committee?

Mr. DAWES. Because I introduced the resolution calling for this information, and it has some reference to a measure now pending before that committee.

The communication was accordingly referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

TELEGRAPH OPERATOR FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War in relation to the employment of a telegraph operator for his Department; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

INCREASED CLERICAL FORCE FOR INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior in relation to an increase of the clerical force in his Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PENITENTIARY IN WYOMING TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriation of March 3, 1873, for building a penitentiary in Wyoming Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CLOTHING FOR THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draught of a joint resolution authorizing the issue of clothing to certain enlisted men of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTION CONTEST.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the answer of George Buchanan and George R. Maxwell on notice of contest; which was referred to the Committee on Elections.

FRANK M. KELLEY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draught of a bill for the relief of Private Frank M. Kelley, Company F, First Cavalry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report in relation to certain private land claims in Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CLERICAL FORCE OF PENSION BUREAU.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the clerical force of the Pension Bureau during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

KANSAS INDIAN LANDS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draught of a bill providing for the sale of the Kansas Indian lands in Kansas to actual settlers, and for the disposition of the proceeds of such sale; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SUBSISTENCE OF MODOC INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of appropriations to subsist the Modoc Indians during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF THE TERRITORIES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriation of March 3, 1873, for the continuation of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SUBSISTENCE OF INDIANS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a special estimate of appropriations required to purchase subsistence for Indian tribes in the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FURNITURE OF THE CAPITOL, ETC.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting an inventory of property belonging to the United States in the possession of the Clerk of the House of Representatives on the 1st of December, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ABOLITION OF THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 8, 1873, in relation to the franking privilege; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

CIVILIZATION OF INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draught of a bill authorizing him to use, for the civilization of Indians, the unexpended balance of appropriation made by the act of March 3, 1871, and an estimate of an appropriation of $50,000 additional; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LAND COMMISSIONERS IN IOWA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the report of commissioners under the act of March 3, 1873, to examine lands in Iowa above the Raccoon Fork of the Des Moines River, with an estimate of an appropriation for payment of the commissioners; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following communication; which, with the accompanying letter, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS,
Washington, D. C., December 16, 1873.

SIR: It becomes my duty, as president of the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to forward the inclosed resignation of Jay Cooke, esq., one of the board of managers, of his position in that board; and ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to report a resolution for the election of a successor.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
BENJAMIN F. BUTLER.

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

GRAND CALUMET RIVER, INDIANA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 3, 1873, in relation to the survey of the Grand Calumet River, in the State of Indiana; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draught of a bill relative to the investment of certain funds belonging to the Prairie band of the Pottawatomie Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY PRISONS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting to the House a report on the subject of military prisons; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MEDICAL AND SURGICAL HISTORY OF THE WAR.

Mr. NUNN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and under the law referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill providing for printing ten thousand copies of the Medical and Surgical History of the War for the use of the House.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to reconsider the vote by which the following resolution was adopted, on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DUELL:]

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings be authorized to investigate and report in writing to the House—

1. The condition and management by the Government officials of the moneys heretofore appropriated for the erection of public buildings.

2. Whether such moneys have been distributed in conformity with the appropriation laws.

3. What retrenchment can be made in the expenditure of moneys appropriated as above, without detriment to the public service; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to take testimony to enable it to make such investigation and report.

And I do so simply for the purpose of striking out the words "to send for persons and papers, and." I have no objection to the investigation going on; but when the chairman of the committee finds it necessary in any special case to send for persons and papers he should submit that question to the House.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now move to strike out the words I have indicated.

The motion was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. BUTLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution, as amended, was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UTAH.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, on the 8th of December a bill (H. R. No. 303) concerning the execution of the laws in the Territory of Utah was introduced and referred to the Committee on the Territories. I move that committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which committee not only has the subject under consideration at this time, but considered the whole matter very fully at the last session, and had a bill almost ready to report, but which it failed to report in consequence of not being called.

Mr. McKEE. I object.

And then, on motion of Mr. BECK, (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. ARCHER: The petition of Frederick F. Baury, for relief.

Also, the petition of Mrs. Adelaide Adams, for additional pension.

By Mr. VANCE: Joint resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina, asking for a law to refund the tax on cotton for the years 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: A bill to establish a post-route in Loudon and Roane Counties, in the State of Tennessee.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 19, 1873.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials are now in order. The Chair will ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment before petitions are received.

Yesterday, as the reading of the Journal shows, when the resolution came from the House of Representatives for an adjournment during the holidays, its consideration was objected to by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] under the twenty-sixth rule. The Chair overruled that objection. Various proceedings were then had, and the Senate adjourned pending a motion to refer that resolution to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered, which would leave that resolution the unfinished business to follow the expiration of the morning hour this morning.

Upon this subject the Chair finds upon examination that on the 13th of December, 1869, a similar resolution came from the House and was laid upon the table on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] The point of order made yesterday was not raised upon that occasion; but the Vice-President and the Senate are supposed, like a court of justice, to take judicial notice at all times of their rules; and the motion and vote of the Senate to lay it upon the table was a dealing with that resolution as much as to have referred it to a committee.

On the 11th of December, 1871, a similar resolution was received by the Senate from the House, and this entry is made:

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution from the House of Representatives.

Then follows the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution is before the Senate, and the question is on agreeing to it, unless some other motion shall be made.

The resolution was concurred in.

The point of order was not raised, but must be presumed to have been disposed of by the action of the Vice-President and Senate. Therefore, the Chair yesterday, advising with the Chief Clerk, overruled the point of order made by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] but on examination of the rule and consideration of the principle and philosophy of it, and conferring again this morning with the Chief Clerk, I am able to announce our unanimous conclusion that the decision made by the Chair yesterday was erroneous. The rule is as follows:

Every bill and joint resolution shall receive three readings previous to its being passed, and the Presiding Officer shall give notice at each whether it be the first, second, or third; which readings shall be on three different days unless the Senate unanimously direct otherwise. And all resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution, or to which the approbation and signature of the President may be requisite, or which may grant money out of the contingent or any other fund, shall be treated, in all respects, in the introduction and form of proceeding on them in the Senate, in a similar manner with bills; and all other resolutions shall lie on the table one day for consideration; and also reports of committees.

Last evening, looking for the first time and hastily at this rule, I was of opinion that the second branch of the rule related only to Senate resolutions; but an examination of the rule entire this morning satisfies me that that is an erroneous construction of the rule and that the point made by the Senator from Vermont was well taken. This is confirmed by the latter clause of the fifty-third rule, which provides:

A motion to suspend, or to concur in a resolution of the House of Representatives to suspend, the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules, or either of them, shall always be in order, always be immediately considered, and be decided without debate.

Upon the principle that expressing one thing excludes the other this rule fortifies the construction which the Chair now gives to the twenty-sixth rule. The Chair will, therefore, reverse the ruling that it made yesterday, and hold that, that ruling having been erroneous, the proceedings which were had upon it fall; that the resolution is now to be considered as having been laid before the Senate yesterday, and under the objection made by the Senator from Vermont laid over until to-day. It will, therefore, not be the unfinished business at one o'clock; but it will be in the power of the Senate to deal with it by motion to proceed to consider it, and then to agree to the resolution, refer it to a committee, or dispose of it in any other way that the Senate sees fit.

Mr. MORTON. What resolution does the Chair refer to? I was not here at the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution for a recess for the holidays.

Mr. DAVIS. I understood the resolution had been taken up by unanimous consent and was being considered when the Senator from Vermont made his point of order. Was it not too late to make that point?

Mr. SHERMAN. After the morning hour is over any Senator can move to take up the resolution. I suppose petitions are now in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials are now in order.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear the Senator from West Virginia on that point at the expiration of the morning hour, when it will properly be in order.

Mr. DAVIS. I will wait, then.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 34) authorizing the Second National Bank of Havana, New York, to change its name;

A bill (H. R. No. 418) to authorize the First National Bank of Saint Anthony, Minnesota, to change its location and name; and

A bill (H. R. No. 798) to establish certain post-routes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a resolution for printing copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the years 1872 and 1873; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented a petition of citizens of South Carolina, praying that national banks may be exempted from taxation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the petition of a large number of respectable citizens of New York, in which they set forth their desire for a general disarmament and the substitution of arbitration for settling international difficulties. They further declare their belief that the war provisions of our Constitution stand in the way, and they ask for the repeal of the war clauses. I confess that to my mind the practical part of this petition is that which calls for the substitution of arbitration in the settlement of difficulties; and as that is already before our Committee on Foreign Relations, I move the reference of this petition to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the memorial of the national convention of colored persons recently assembled here in Washington, praying to be protected in their civil rights.

It will be remembered, sir, that this was a convention, numerous and also most intelligent, which recently sat in the national capital. I am told that it was composed of three hundred and thirty delegates, representing no less than twenty-nine States and two Territories. They united in adopting an address to the people of the United States, and also a petition to Congress. That petition I now hold in my hand. It sets forth the denial of rights to which they are now subjected, the indignities to which they are exposed in travel, in the school-room, in public institutions, and in the court-house through the denial of an impartial jury; and it asks for the adoption of a thorough civil rights law. Their idea is expressed in a resolution reported by a leading committee, to which the subject was referred, and afterward adopted by the convention, as follows:

That we earnestly petition the Congress of the United States, representing, as it does, the two great political parties above referred to, being committed, as they are, to the doctrine of civil rights, to pass at the earliest practicable moment, in the interest of justice and humanity, the civil rights bill now pending in the United States Senate, and known as Senate bill No. 1, or some equally comprehensive and just measure.

As this memorial, sir, proceeds from a representative convention, so numerous, so respectable, I think I shall not err, and that I shall have the indulgence of the Senate if, when I now present it, I ask that it be printed for the use of the Senate. That is a motion very rarely made, I know, with regard to petitions, which certainly I have not made myself in many years, but which I think, at this time, under the circumstances, I am justified in making.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the memorial presented by him be printed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SUMNER. Now I ask that it lie on the table.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that the memorial be read, so that we may see what it is before we order it to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. I have already stated its contents. It sets forth the grievances of the colored race at this moment, and their earnest desire for redress, and argues them under the Constitution, to my mind unanswerably, showing that under the Constitution Congress is fully empowered to pass a law fixing all their rights. I think the Senator can have no objection to its printing.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn. The memorial will be printed and laid on the table.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of C. K. Curtis and others, praying to be restored to their proper rank in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the petition of Joseph Council, of Mobile, Alabama, praying compensation for raising, repairing, and delivering the steamer St. Patrick at the navy-yard, Pensacola, Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Thomas H. Phillipson, late captain of the Fourth New York Volunteer Cavalry, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Samuel Wilson, late private of Company F, One hundred and sixteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SCOTT. I present the petition of the Radical Club of Philadelphia, praying that no duty be placed upon tea and coffee, but that taxation may be decreased by certain changes of the national banking law suggested by them. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WEST presented the petition of Mrs. Caroline L. Hoey, of Carrollton, Louisiana, praying compensation for property taken and destroyed by the United States Army in 1862, 1863, and 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCHURZ presented the memorial of Joseph San Roman, of Cameron County, Texas, administrator of James B. Armstrong, deceased, praying an appropriation for the payment of the balance of a certain judgment of the Court of Claims against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TIPTON presented additional papers in the case of Charles Lanman, in relation to the publication of the Congressional Directory; which, together with his papers now on the files, were referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. CONKLING. The Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, moved perhaps by a recent very shocking casualty which sent mourning to many honored homes, particularly in the State of New York, has been considering the question of collisions upon the crowded vessel track on the ocean between Europe and this country, and send a memorial to Congress praying that an international commission be appointed to consider the whole subject and devise such regulations as may hereafter guard human life. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to present also the petition of W. H. Ward, a citizen of the State of New York, asking compensation for the use by the Government of a bullet machine invented by him; and pursuant to his request I move its reference—I believe it to be appropriate—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the memorial of Mary Ann Daniel, in behalf of her son, Major John Townsend Daniel, asking an increase of his pension. I move its reference to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the memorial of Tifft, Griswold & Co., and various other leading firms in New York; Elliot C. Cowdin & Co., and others, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I also present the petition of a number of persons, graduates of the United States Naval Academy, praying to be restored to their legal rank in the naval service, of which they allege themselves to have been deprived. I move its reference to the Committee onNaval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Madeira and Cabada be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. HITCHCOCK, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers praying that the military reservation at Fort Kearney, Nebraska, be donated to certain charitable institutions of that State be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. HITCHCOCK, it was Ordered, That the memorial and accompanying papers concerning the claim of A. V. Richards, late lieutenant United States Army, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. HITCHCOCK, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying Senate bill No. 1413, third session, Forty-second Congress, to authorize the appointment of a captain of scouts, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. HITCHCOCK, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Elisha Basse be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. HITCHCOCK, it was Ordered, That the memorial and accompanying papers concerning the claim of Albert Towle, postmaster at Beatrice, Nebraska, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of William McCarrick, praying arrears of bounty, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That Peter Campbell have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Ella Carroll be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Calvin Chipman of Manchester, Michigan, praying for a pension for services rendered in the war of 1812, reported adversely theron, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina in relation to the tax levied on cotton by the United States Government in the years 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON. Perhaps I ought to state that this report does not relate to the merits of the question embraced in these resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina, but, as will be seen, any legislation relating to it must originate in the House of Representatives.

DISTILLERY WAREHOUSES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 614) to so amend the laws relative to internal revenue as to allow distillery warehouses to be continued in use after changes have occurred in the management of the business, to report it without amendment, and to say that this bill is intended to relieve certain cases of hardship growing out of the provisions of the law in regard to distillery warehouses. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The bill (H. R. No. 614) to so amend the laws relative to internal revenue as to allow distillery warehouses to be continued in use after changes have occurred in the management of the business was read at length.

It provides that when from death or from any other cause there shall be a change in the person, firm, or company engaged in the business of distilling at any distillery, and the person, firm, or company that, by reason of such change, ceases to carry on such business at such distillery has at the time of such change spirits in the distillery warehouse, it shall be lawful for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, upon the written consent of the surviving principals and sureties interested, and under such rules and regulations and upon such other conditions as he may prescribe, to permit the succeeding person, firm, or company to use the distillery warehouse on the premises in the same manner as if it did not contain distilled spirits belonging to the original person, firm, or company, after setting apart and separating, by a secure and unbroken partition, such portion of it as may be necessary for the storage and safe-keeping of the spirits distilled by the original person, firm, or company during the period allowed by law for the removal of distilled spirits from distillery warehouses, or until said spirits are removed and the tax paid thereon within that time. But nothing contained in the bill is to impair or in any way affect the lien existing at the time of such change under section 1 of the internal-revenue act of July 20, 1868, as amended, or other liabilities under any internal-revenue law, but the existence of such lien shall be no ground for refusing to approve the bond of the succeeding person, firm, or company, anything in section 8 of the act of July 20, 1868, as amended, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope this bill will be acted on. It is recommended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. It is to the interest of the United States as well as of a large number of distillers in the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor. If one of the members of a distillery firm now dies, there may be whisky in bond, and there is no way to carry on that business as the law now is. A loss of revenue to the United States from the stoppage of the business must necessarily ensue. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue attempted to form regulations to allow the business to go on notwithstanding the death of one of the parties in such a firm; but he found out that the law was defective. Therefore both in Indiana and in Kentucky, and in all the States where the distilleries are being operated, the change of a firm or the death of a partner stops all their operations provided whisky is in the warehouse. This bill cures that, and I sincerely hope the Senate will take it up and pass it.

This bill was prepared by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I will read his letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, December 15, 1873.

SIR: Inclosed I return to you the draught of a bill submitted by you for my examination. I am of the opinion that some such bill should be passed. I inclose the draught of one which embraces such changes in yours as seem to me judicious.

Very respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS,
Commissioner.

Hon. JAMES B. BECK, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The bill prepared by the Commissioner is the bill which passed the House, and is now the bill which I ask the Senate to pass at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the consideration of the bill. It is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRINTING OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 140) to amend the act of Congress to expedite and regulate the printing of public documents, approved June 25, 1864, to report it back to the Senate without any recommendation. This bill involves a question much greater than that which was referred to the committee in the bill itself; and that is, whether we are going to continue the practice of printing extra copies of documents for popular distribution. Leaving my colleagues on the committee to answer this question for themselves, I have no hesitation in saying that I have come to the conclusion that, in the absence of some means of free transmission of the documents, it is unwise to publish them. It is desirable that this bill should be acted upon before we go away, because the matter is now in type and the law requires the Congressional Printer to print, I think, 35,000 copies, and of course he must obey the law unless we repeal it now, and if we are not going into the practice of printing documents for popular distribution, it is hardly necessary to go on with this publication.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is the bill? I ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the first section of the act of Congress to expedite and regulate the printing of public documents as directs the publication, in one volume, of the President's message, the executive documents, and an abridgment of the accompanying reports, for popular distribution, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope there will be no action taken on the subject at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No motion is made to proceed to the consideration of the bill. It is simply reported by the committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. I asked for its consideration; but the Senator objects, and that of course concludes it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Before I object I wish to make one general remark. It is obvious that the whole subject of the publication and distribution of documents must at some time come before Congress. It is idle to print these documents and have them piled up in our rooms. It is just as idle to consider the probability of members of Congress distributing them at their own expense. As the law now stands, it seems by implication to be imposed upon members of Congress as a duty to distribute these documents; and in contemplation of the action, if I may refer to it, in the other branch, it will be seen that, having repealed the franking privilege and so disenabled Congress for the distribution of these documents, Congress must now make an appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States for the distribution of these documents, amounting to many hundreds of thousands of dollars. That is what it comes to. The question, therefore, will be for Congress to consider whether we are not to suppose that, in view of the abolition of the franking privilege, thus disenabling members of Congress to do that thing, and what is taking place now with regard to their salaries, it is utterly impossible to make this distribution.

Why, sir, the distribution of these documents now, under the regulations of the Post-Office Department, would devolve upon each member of Congress an expense of not less than $2,000. Nobody expects Congress to do any such thing as that; and nobody expects that the people are going to solicit the distribution of these documents at their own charge. While the subject remains in that condition I am opposed to the printing of any documents whatever. Therefore I hope the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, who has charge of the public printing, will see that there is no publication at all of documents of a public character beyond what is wanted for the Departments and the immediate archives here until the whole subject is considered and we determine whether it is for the public interest that these documents should be distributed under the present rates of postage. Take the document now under consideration. It contains how many volumes, if I may be allowed to ask?

Mr. ANTHONY. One volume.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. How many pages?

Mr. ANTHONY. Six or seven hundred pages; probably more. It depends upon the length of the document to be abridged.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That will cost $1.50. Who is going to send it; who wants it at $1.50?

Mr. ANTHONY. The postage will cost about fifty cents.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to say that the distribution of the Smithsonian Report costs forty-two cents postage, and that is a document of about two hundred pages. Everybody knows that the people of this country do not expect that we are to distribute these documents at their expense—that we are going to make a law by which they shall be distributed through the mails. Sir, if it were advisable at all to do this thing the documents can be sent from the city of Washington through the expresses at one-tenth the cost that they can be sent through the post-office under the present regulations.

Mr. ANTHONY. Allow me to interrupt the Senator for a moment. I think he does not comprehend the nature of this bill. This bill proposes to repeal the law which requires this particular document to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am in favor of that; but I am opposed to any action in the premises until the whole subject is considered.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Maine did not, perhaps, catch the remark of the Senator from Rhode Island, who said that during the recess, or during the next two or three weeks, extra documents will be printed unless Congress suspends the operation of those laws; and I was about to submit to him whether it would not be well enough to take up this bill and amend it so as to suspend for a reasonable time—say two or three months—the publication of these documents.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think I was under a misapprehension as to the character of this bill. It proposes to do precisely what I desire, to stop the publication of this document.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ascertain whether, if we pass this bill to repeal the law authorizing the condensation of the departmental reports in one volume, it does not revive necessarily the laws which require that those reports shall be printed in extenso in several volumes, so that we shall get something worse?

Mr. ANTHONY. Of course they must be printed in extenso for the use of Congress, but not for popular distribution. It would be a farce to lay a document before us and not print it.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand that the law which this bill would repeal is a measure of economy so far as it goes, in that instead of printing several volumes we simply print one condensing the matter into one volume, and dispensing with the printing of the other volumes.

Mr. ANTHONY. This bill would not require the printing of the old number that we used to print of the full set.

Mr. SARGENT. But it will require them all to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. They are all printed, of course. The President's message and accompanying documents are, of course, printed for the use of Congress, but not for popular distribution. They must be printed; we cannot read them unless they are printed. We cannot read them at the Clerk's desk in manuscript. While up, I will add that I find that this document will probably consist of about seven hundred and fifty pages.

Mr. BOREMAN. What is the number of copies printed now?

Mr. ANTHONY. Thirty-five thousand.

Mr. STEVENSON. May I ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether he proposes to continue the same number?

Mr. ANTHONY. I propose to discontinue the publication of it altogether, and rely on the publication in extenso. This is an abridgment of the President's message and the accompanying documents, which are the records of the year. They are sent to us, and must be printed as a matter of course; otherwise we cannot see them. We cannot read it in manuscript. This is the abridgment which has been for years printed for public distribution.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Senator from Rhode Island proposes to repeal the printing of the thirty-five thousand copies.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; that is the bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope that will be done.

Mr. SARGENT. In so far as this is a measure of economy I am in favor of it; but it seems to me that the committee ought to consider and report at a very early day some bill which will cover this whole subject. The point is not merely as to the printing of this abridgment of the departmental reports, but there are a great many other volumes which are being printed under laws now in force, and which are required to be printed. There may not be extra copies of them printed, but the volumes are put in type and a limited number of each is printed at a cost of two-thirds or three-fourths what it would cost to print the whole volume with the extra copies. The great cost is in putting them in type and fixing the forms and the original press-work, as the honorable Senator from Rhode Island very well understands. There are a great many laws in force under which the Public Printer is acting continually; and it seems to me that if we adopt this measure now, the other and principal proposition may pass without notice for some time to come, and we have no remedy for this mischief.

If the resolution which is upon our table that came from the House of Representatives yesterday is passed, the cost of printing the Agricultural Reports, for which it provides, will be $138,000, as I understand from the debates on that measure in the other end of the Capitol; and although they are now in type, and there is nothing to be done except to fix the forms again upon the presses, supply the paper, and make the impressions, the cost at the Public Printing Office for the printing of and binding of these reports will be $138,000. If those reports are to go out to the people, perhaps the valuable character of the documents might justify this large expenditure; but to send out these documents alone, provided for in a single resolution, under the laws as they now are, will cost the members of Congress and Senators $92,000. The cost to each Senator will be, not a little over $500, as I stated yesterday, but on a more accurate calculation I find that it will be $675. Are we prepared to do anything of the kind?

Mr. CRAGIN. Allow me to ask the Senator a question? Does he not suppose that if the documents are printed some way will be provided by which they can be sent free through the mails?

Mr. SARGENT. I am in favor of sending those which are necessary through the mails without expense to Congress, unless we bear the whole expense of printing and binding. As I said yesterday, if we are to do anything in this matter let us do it generously and save the people from any expense. I can see no logic in requiring us to pay $92,000 for the postage on these documents and not to pay the $138,000 for the printing of them, or our proportion of the $137,968 which it costs to fold them and put them in order to be sent by the mails. I see no reason why we should pay one-third of the whole expense, or one-fourth of it, or one-half of it, and the people pay the rest. There is nothing that is sacred in postage any more than there is in printing. If we should be at the expense of sending this information to the people, let us be at the whole expense or none. In other words, I do not think we ought to be at the expense at all. I do not think the compensation which is paid to us was intended to cover that, and I am fortified in that idea by the demand that the compensation shall be reduced, the compensation having been increased at the time the franking privilege was abolished.

I do not wish to detain the Senate by a debate on this matter; but I wish to call attention to these large figures and to the fact that a careless vote either causes these amounts to be saddled upon Congress, or a greater amount for printing and folding is wasted by these documents lying for months and months, perhaps for years, unused in the rooms in the basement of the Capitol.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, the only real saving that was effected by the abolition of the franking privilege was in the publication of documents. I am unwilling, for one, to surrender any gain that may have been made by the abolition of the franking privilege, and which, in my judgment, is the sole advantage of that most popular measure.

I attempted, some years ago, to have a reform in relation to the printing and distribution of documents. There are but two or three, or very few at most, that ought to be distributed among the people. Among these are, perhaps, the Compendium of the Census; possibly the Agricultural Report—although the President does not seem to mention it in his message this year as of any importance, and I do not know but that he judged rightly—and the Smithsonian Report. Other governments are in the habit of publishing their documents with a simple paper cover, allowing their citizens to come and take them at the net cost price. Why, sir, I can send to-day to Paris or London and get a French or an English document at a less cost than it can be obtained here, simply because they are published here with binding, and the large cost of postage.

Now, sir, I hope that we shall not go back to the franking privilege for the purpose of reviving the printing business on the part of Congress. I do not believe that we can conduct a great publication establishment with any degree of skill or advantage to the country, and certainly the abandonment of the printing of a large number of comparatively useless documents to me seems a very important measure of reform, and if we have affected it let us stick to it, so far as the enormous cost is concerned of printing, of paper, and binding, and sending out documents which are not read and rarely referred to.

But, Mr. President, I must say this: that if we should publish the Compendium of the Census, Smithsonian Report, and the Agricultural Report, and send them out free in the mails, it would not add, as I am led to believe, one single dollar to the expense of this Government, so far as any additional pay to mail contractors is concerned.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont a question in reference to the alleged reduction of expense caused by the repeal of the franking privilege, this reform that he is in favor of. Why was it when the franking privilege was repealed and the public documents stopped in their circulation that immediately the amount for carrying the mails through the different railroad companies of the United States was increased?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand that any objection is made to the present consideration of this bill? ["No!" "No!"] The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not propose to go into that subject at the present time. On a proper occasion I shall be perfectly willing to discuss this matter; but if the Senator desires to ask any question on that subject I prefer that he would ask it of the distinguished chairman of the Post-Office Committee.

Mr. RAMSEY. I can answer the Senator if he will allow me.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. RAMSEY. You, by your own enactment here, regulated the compensation of railroads for carrying the mails about the time that the franking privilege was repealed, but that has not fully taken effect yet. The Post-Office Department has addressed all the railroad companies carrying the mails, and are getting returns up to October last. After that the readjustment takes place. It is in pursuance of your own law.

Mr. LOGAN. That is exactly what I wanted to get before the country—that the very Congress which repealed the franking privilege on the ground that it would save a million or more dollars in payment of mail carrying, did, by their own act, increase the prices to be paid for carrying the mail. That is the manner in which we have been saving money by repealing the franking privilege.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the bill read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the bill by adding to it:

And that so much of all resolutions of Congress, or of either House, as requires the publication of extra documents for distribution be, and is hereby, repealed.

Mr. STEVENSON. I concur in the suggestions of my friend from Rhode Island; but it seems to me that a wiser course would be to refer the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, who might then have before them any mode which shall be proposed to restore in whole or in part the franking privilege, or to prescribe some plan by which these documents may go out.

I differ wholly with the Senator from Vermont as to the franking privilege. It may have been abused, but a verier humbug, in my judgment, was never thrown out to the people than the abolition of that privilege. It is the vital breath of a free people that they should know what goes on here, and that the representatives of the people should inform them, and they never can be informed, and representative responsibility ceases, when you close the doors that let your constituents know what is transacted in Congress.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Kentucky does not differ from the Senator from Vermont in relation to the humbug of that measure. I only desire to save what I regard as a positive reform that cannot be effected in any other way. I voted in favor of this repeal because I thought the people demanded it, and then announced that I would vote for its restoration as soon as the people demanded it, it being a mere matter of expediency. I felt at liberty, as no principle was involved, to consult their wishes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am very glad to hear the Senator from Vermont disavow the sentiment which I supposed he advocated, and I am exceedingly rejoiced to know that we shall have his valuable aid in some restoration of this franking privilege under limitations and restrictions which will prevent its abuse.

Now, if we shall refer this bill to the proper committee, who shall have before it the subject of how far the franking privilege shall be restored, that is, what documents shall go free, we shall be better informed and be better able to judge what number of documents ought to be printed. I hope, myself, that the franking privilege will be restored, subject to wholesome restrictions. I consider it absolutely essential, not only to prevent extravagant and vicious legislation, but to enable the people themselves to be enlightened as to what we, their agents, are doing.

Some gentlemen differ in regard to what documents are of value. On that point I would be with the Senator from Vermont; but there are other documents besides those mentioned by him that the western people feel a deep interest in. Let all of them have such documents as they desire, and let us restrict the number in such a way as to prevent extravagance, and let us restore this privilege, which I consider most essential in a free government, under those limitations which Congress shall provide.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to this bill being referred to the Committee on Appropriations, or any other disposition of it.

Mr. LOGAN. Let it go there.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have only a word to say. I ought to have said when I was up, and I am sure my friend from California will be glad to hear it, that he was misinformed when he stated that any printing had been done for any Department beyond the appropriation. I saw the Congressional Printer this morning. He says that not a dollar has been expended, and that he has no right to expend a dollar, beyond the amount which has been appropriated by Congress.

Mr. SARGENT. I am very glad to hear it. I will state, however, that my authority was the chief clerk at the Public Printing Office. It is possible I may have misunderstood him, but one case he instanced was that of the Court of Claims, where $25,000 worth of printing had been ordered beyond the amount appropriated for that court.

Mr. ANTHONY. But probably not executed.

Mr. SARGENT. Of course, I may have been mistaken.

Mr. ANTHONY. We hear so much about the extravagance of the Public Printing Office that I want Senators to understand that within a few years we have added to that establishment the printing of the blanks and blank-books for every custom-house in this country from Eastport to the Rio Grande; printing the blanks and the blank-books for every post-office, for every pension-office, for every land-office, for every depository of the public money. They are all printed here; and the great advantage of printing them here is that they are all uniform, and the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who lately presided with so much ability over the Treasury Department, will inform us, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] well knows how important it is that they should be all identical; that those blanks, which are in duplicate, one set being bound in the Treasury Department and the other sent from the local office, should be precisely identical and printed on the same form; how much clerical labor it saves, how much authenticity it secures. The late Secretary, or his chief clerk, addressed a letter some time since to the Congressional Printer, stating that the cost of the binding and the blank-books executed at the Congressional Printing Office, instead of being executed at the various places, was little more than one-half, and in some instances only one-fourth; and this, although printing and binding are higher here than anywhere else, because they are done here as economically as the prices paid will allow—as economically as the law will allow, which has established an aristocracy of labor here by enacting that persons who work for the Government shall only work eight hours, while the rest of us have to work ten. But it is all done with regularity and with all the economy consistent with the prices which Congress enacts, for to shorten the hours of labor is substantially to increase the wages of labor, and without any jobs or any favoritism.

Mr. STEVENSON. May I ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether, if this bill be not now passed, the printing of these documents will go on without any further order?

Mr. ANTHONY. It must go on, for the law requires it; but if there was an indication—and one object I had in offering this bill now was, that if there was an indication of a disposition to repeal these laws, I would take the liberty to advise the Congressional Printer. I could do no more than advise that he stereotype this work and wait a further time for printing, because he may occupy the office profitably with other work. That would be some expense, but not very great, for it does not cost much to stereotype.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will inform the Senator from Rhode Island that I have modified my amendment so as to suspend the operation of all these laws and resolutions requiring printing until further action by Congress, and I hope it will prevail, because otherwise there will be an immense accumulation of documents that have been previously ordered. I propose to suspend all that for the present.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to have the amendment read as it now stands.

Mr. STEVENSON. I withdraw all I said about a reference of the bill to the Committee on Appropriations. I would rather see this bill passed immediately so as to stop all printing, and when that is stopped we can hereafter agree as to such modifications as the case may require.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, as modified, reads:

And that so much of all resolutions of Congress, or of either House, as requires the publication of extra documents for distribution be, and the same is hereby, suspended.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it would be good economy, if there is any doubt about the ultimate passage of this bill, to except stereotyping, for that is not very expensive; and if we distribute the type, and then conclude to print the document, we have not to set up the type again.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will accept that amendment. I do not know anything about the details practically.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the bill just passed the Senator from Rhode Island tells me that in order to cover the technical language used in some resolutions the word "popular" should be inserted before "distribution." I hope that may be done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to that amendment of the bill just passed? The Chair hears none, and the word will be inserted.

OFFICIAL SALARIES.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 793) to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back with amendments, and, as amended, to recommend its passage. If I shall get the floor at the expiration of the morning hour, I propose to call up the bill, and trust the Senate will proceed at once to its consideration, and, with as little debate as possible, dispose of it.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 227) relating to settlers upon Osage trust lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 228) for the relief of Bigler, Young & Co.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on the files of the Senate, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 229) authorizing corrections to be made in errors in prize lists; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CONOVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 230) to establish certain post-roads in the State of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution, received yesterday from the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Congressional Printer be instructed to furnish to each Senator, and to each Member and Delegate in the House of Representatives, twenty-four copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or of any such like official report of the debates in Congress as may hereafter be authorized by law, either daily, as originally published, or in the revised form, without binding, or in bound volumes, or part in each form, as each Senator, Member, and Delegate may elect.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF AGRICULTURE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution, yesterday received from the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed of the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the years 1872 and 1873, 255,000 copies of each; 180,000 of each of which shall be for the use of the House, 50,000 of each shall be for the use of the Senate, and 25,000 of each shall be for distribution by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 798) to establish certain post-routes was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF SAINT ANTHONY.

The bill (H. R. No. 418) to authorize the First National Bank of Saint Anthony, Minnesota, to change its location and name was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will simply state that a similar bill passed the Senate at the last session, and I hope this bill will be laid on the table for the present, and probably it can be taken up presently and passed without the necessity of a reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is very unusual.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have no objection to its lying on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid upon the table.

Mr. RAMSEY subsequently said: The chairman of the Committee on Finance has looked at the House bill to authorize the First National Bank, of Saint Anthony, Minnesota, to change its location and name. There is no objection, I believe, and I ask that it be now taken up and considered.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 418) to authorize the First National Bank, of Saint Anthony, Minnesota, to change its location and name.

It authorizes the First National Bank, of Saint Anthony, now located in the city of Saint Anthony, in the County of Hennepin, Minnesota, to change its location to the city of Minneapolis, in that county and State. Whenever the stockholders, representing three-fourths of the capital stock of the bank, at a meeting called for that purpose, determine to make such change, the president and cashier are to execute a certificate under the corporate seal of the bank specifying such determination, and cause the same to be recorded in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and thereupon such change of location is to take effect, and the operations of discount and deposit of the bank are to be carried on in the city of Minneapolis; but such acceptance is to be made within six months after the passage of the act, and all expenses incident to the proposed change, including engraving, are to be borne and paid by the bank.

Nothing in this act is to be so construed as in any manner to release the bank from any liability, or to affect any action or any proceeding in law in which the bank may be a party interested.

Whenever the location of the bank shall have been changed from the city of Saint Anthony to the city of Minneapolis, its name is to be changed to "Merchants' National Bank, of Minneapolis," and all debts, demands, liabilities, rights, and powers belonging to the First National Bank, of Saint Anthony, Minnesota, are to devolve upon and inure to the Merchants' National Bank, of Minneapolis, and all actions pending by or against the First National Bank, of Saint Anthony, may be prosecuted by or against the Merchants' National Bank, of Minneapolis, in the same manner, and with the same effect, as if such change of location and name had not been made.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SECOND NATIONAL BANK, OF HAVANA, NEW YORK.

The bill (H. R. No. 34) authorizing the Second National Bank, of Havana, New York, to change its name, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONKLING. I know the circumstances of that case. My honorable friend from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, says he will make no objection to my calling up that bill. If the Senate will be kind enough to hear it read, I think there will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 34) authorizing the Second National Bank of Havana, New York, to change its name. It provides that the name of the Second National Bank of Havana, New York, shall be changed to "Havana National Bank," of Havana, New York, whenever the board of directors of the bank shall accept the new name by a resolution of the board, confirmed by a vote of two-thirds of the stockholders, and cause a copy of such action, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency; but such acceptance is to be made within six months after the passage of the act, and all expenses incident to the proposed change, including engraving, are to be borne and paid by the bank.

All the debts, demands, liabilities, charges, privileges, and powers of the Second National Bank of Havana are to devolve upon and inure to the Havana National Bank, of Havana, New York, whenever such change of name is effected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to inquire of the Senator from New York what is the reason of this change? The change is so slight that I have no objection to it; but I should like to have a reason on the record for the change.

Mr. CONKLING. It is very slight. The particulars of the convenience of the bank I cannot state. As it stands now, it leads to a certain confusion about the name which annoys them, and impedes their business, and they want to give it a distinctive name, as the Senate will see, transposing a little its present name. That is all there is of it, as I understand. It involves no change of location and nothing in the world but the mere appellation of the bank.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance, and on that subject the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] is entitled to to the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. I move to lay aside that resolution and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution providing for a recess during the holidays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves to lay aside the pending and all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives in regard to an adjournment for the holidays.

Mr. MORTON and Mr. SHERMAN. I hope not.

Mr. CHANDLER. I trust the Senator from Missouri will go on with his remarks. There are several other gentlemen who would like to be heard on that subject briefly; and I hope there will be no interruption, at least for an hour, of the regular order of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I took no part in the debate yesterday respecting the order of business in this body, as affected by the propositon to take a recess in accordance with the resolution which came here from the House of Representatives, from to-night until the 5th of January. I abstained from discussion then because I thought the tone and temper of the Senate in discussing the matter was not that in which I desired to participate. I did not think it favorable to a wise, decorous, dignified disposition of a subject of so much importance.

I did not then understand, nor can I now understand, why it was that an issue was sought to be created in advance in this Senate Chamber respecting a measure of great importance, the consideration of which is soon to be brought before the Senate. I refer to the bill to repeal the bankrupt law. Upon what foundation any Senator undertook to speak for the sentiments of gentlemen on this side or the other side of the Chamber I cannot divine. The question of the repeal of that law had not been before the Senate. There had been no expression of sentiment in respect to it except those exceedingly premature expressions which came from gentlemen anticipating that the will of the Senate must necessarily fall in with what they were pleased to call a strong popular demand for the absolute wiping out of that measure from the statute-book.

Mr. President, I recognize the great importance of a bankrupt law. I recognized fully the importance of having its consideration at an early day; but I recognize, also, the great danger of considering such a measure in haste, and wiping it from your statute-book or amending it in important particulars without due consideration. Haste overruns speed, as we are told in a proverb; and to make haste slowly is certainly a wise injunction.

The bankrupt law of the United States was passed in 1867 under a strong sense of the popular necessity for such a measure. The wisdom of that provision of the Constitution of the United States that deposited this power with Congress, in order to secure uniformity in the operation of such laws upon the commerce of the country, was strongly recognized and found expression in the law then passed. From that time to the present, six long years, that law has been the subject of constant amendment. As late as February of the present year, 1873, an amendment was brought before this body, and it became a law, permitting, under the great emergency caused by the dreadful fire in Boston, the State laws of Massachusetts to retain control of the vast assets of the insurance companies in that State, without respect to the general jurisdiction of the bankrupt law of the United States. There was not then hot haste; there was not then the creation of issues and the attempt to force expressions of opinions in advance. No, sir; there was simply presented an emergency arising from a terrible fact, the conflagration that had destroyed a great portion of the property of one of our most important commercial cities. Not one word was then said in discussion in regard to the repeal of this law; the subject was much too broad. There was something said with regard to amendment, but amendment then was felt to be so important that it had better be confined to the special class of large cases which were the subject of consideration at that time.

And I say here now that this question, if introduced to-day, ought to receive the most deliberate consideration of the Senate; and while I will not say that my mind is so closed against conviction that I shall not be willing to see this law entirely repealed, yet it will require a great degree of attention and long argument before I shall be willing that a measure so necessary in every commercial country—a measure without which no known commercial country exists—shall cease to exist in our own, and our people be thrown back to all the divergencies of opinion, to all the conflict of laws, which will result from recommitting this question to the action of the different State Legislatures.

Sir, this law has been in operation; its defects have been disclosed; its advantages have been disclosed. It is open to amendment; it requires amendment; but that its destruction is required is a proposition too serious to be passed upon without the gravest and most deliberate consideration on the part of Congress.

Now, sir, have we at this time this pressing need, instantly, within three or four days, to make this repeal the law of this country? Ought we to do it? Can we practically do it? And is there any such necessity as would compel us to sit here during the proper, reasonable, and wholesome time given for repose and recreation to all classes in this country, and to go without a recess for the Christmas season in order to enable the sentiments of Congress to be declared a few days earlier on this subject?

It seems to me to be assumed that the Congress of the United States were going to repeal this law. I do not know that such will be the case, or that they should amend it in important particulars in order to protect individuals who are now suffering from the malefficient features of this law. I do not know whether that would be the case, but I do know that although the subject is entitled to the prompt and deliberate consideration of Congress, there is no reason why it should be taken up and decided within the two or three days within which it is now proposed. I see no such necessity.

I do not believe that the people of this country are to be served by hasty legislation. I believe they are better to be served by deliberate legislation which, when once completed, is permitted to remain stable. The trouble of our legislation, Mr. President, is its want of stability; it is this constant yielding to an ignorant popular demand for change when the necessity for change does not exist. Our people do not let their laws stand long enough to understand their general result, their ultimate effect. A law cannot be judged by single cases of its influence and operation; it must be judged as to its general policy after years of experience. These hasty changes disarrange business; they destroy the dignity of legislation; they destroy that permanence of business interests which it is the best care of the legislator to protect.

Now, sir, what reason is there, unless this bankrupt bill is to be driven as a plow-share through this body without full opportunity for discussion, for its passage by Tuesday night next, as has been proposed? It is better for the people of this country that there should be some opportunity of consultation afforded to the representatives who sit in this chamber with their constituencies before the final action is taken on the bill. Public attention has been drawn to this law; the attention of Senators has been called to this law; and my own belief is that the result of our action, after two weeks of consideration and of consultation with those of our constituents whom we may meet, will lead to a far more beneficial result in the way of legislation than if we attempt to act upon it now within the few days in which necessarily the consideration must be crowded before the adjournment.

Mr. President, I have no cheap professions to make in regard to devotion to the public business. I am not disposed to push aside public interests for my private advantage or to consider my private affairs when they are brought in competition with demands upon me for the execution of public duties. I believe, however, that a recess of Congress at the season of Christmas is wholesome, decent, orderly, and proper. It is a season which should be remembered, which should be observed. In it is included the day of days for this world's history. And I think it is the part of wisdom, in America certainly, to encourage the observance of such times, of such meetings, of such household-gatherings, rather than to discourage them. Our country wants holidays; our people want holidays. There is a feverish devotion to mere business, mere money-getting, in this country which is not well, in my opinion, for the national character. I consider that the people of this country would be better served if home virtues prevailed rather more than they do in the city of Washington and in the Congress of the United States.

Our Legislatures make their adjournments at proper seasons; in fact, as was well remarked by my friend from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] yesterday, they do not pretend to meet for the transaction of public business until after this proper holiday of Christmas has passed and gone. Therefore I trust this resolution will be taken up. I trust that the sentiment which has been expressed by the House twice in the two resolutions sent to us, the first of which we postponed indefinitely, the second of which is under consideration and which shortens the time of the holidays by one day, adjourning to the 5th instead of the 6th of January—I trust it may be accepted and adopted by the Senate. I do not believe that any wholesome legislation can take place in respect to even so important a measure as the bankrupt act in the few days that can be given for its discussion by defeating the present resolution. I trust that it will be adopted, and that we may, upon meeting here in January next, take up at once, and thoroughly and calmly and deliberately discuss, the question whether the bankrupt law should be repealed or whether it should be subjected to such amendments as shall relieve the hardships of which it is now capable of being made an instrument.

I am in favor of the adjournment for the time fixed by the House; and it may be proper for me here to say that the Senate should recollect that it is a joint resolution. It is not the separate will of the Senate that is to be consulted; it is the joint will of both bodies, who should co-operate in respect to matters of general legislation. And depend upon it, sir, if the will of the House is to be so entirely thwarted by the Senate in disregarding its reiterated expressions of opinion in regard to this matter of adjournment, the methods by which that will has been thwarted will not be likely to receive much success when they come into the hands of that co-ordinate body. We cannot whip legislation through the Senate and compel the House to join with this body for the sake of obtaining their adjournment. Sir, that is not the proper temper of legislation; it is not the proper theory of legislation; and it would be, in my opinion, much to be condemned on every score. I think that there should be between the two Houses of Congress comity—a feeling of mutual respect and accommodation. Upon subjects of this kind I think there ought to be consideration for the wishes of the co-ordinate body. If that respect be not given voluntarily it will be in some degree compelled, and each House must learn that fact from the action of the other.

I therefore trust in this case that the assent of the Senate will be given to this reiterated expression of opinion on the part of the House, and that we may adjourn at the time indicated, and at the end of the recess come here prepared to do our full duty wisely and calmly for the best interests of the country.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, we have now been in session three weeks, and have accomplished absolutely nothing in the three weeks. We have alarmed the country a little; raised the price of gold a few per cent.; deranged business somewhat; done no good to anybody or anything; and now, having been in session three weeks and acomplished nothing, you propose to run home and rest, do you?

Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware says that the attention of the country has been called to the bankrupt law. There is the rub, sir. The attention of the country has been called to the bankrupt law, and its attention has been called to that law in such a way that it will work more mischief in the next two or three weeks than has been wrought since the panic commenced. The creditor class are now demanding their pound of flesh, under the apprehension that the involuntary clause of that law may be repealed on the reassembling of Congress. Men by the thousand will be thrown into bankruptcy during the recess which you now propose to take.

I hold in my hand a letter received yesterday from the Lake Superior iron mines, from a man interested in the iron mines there. Those iron mines have shipped this year a million and a quarter tons of iron ore, and but for the panic they would have shipped one million five hundred thousand tons this year. That ore is all sold on four months' time—sold to furnaces and rolling mills; it goes all over the United States to be mixed with poorer ore, particularly in Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York, Illinois, and Wisconsin. It is all sold upon four months' time. Those rolling mills have sold their iron to the railroads; the railroads have repudiated; the furnaces cannot pay, and there are millions upon millions—and no man can estimate the number of millions—of property in Lake Superior in the shape of iron mines that may within the next two weeks be thrown into bankruptcy unless we have some action on the bankrupt law before we take this recess. If we cannot perfect a law, let us at least suspend the involuntary clause of the old law for six or twelve months. We can do that in five minutes. Suspend the involuntary clause of the old law, and then, after having done that and proceeded a little further in the discussion of the currency question, done a few things that will at least be a credit to us, if it be deemed by the majority best, let us take a recess and enjoy ourselves with roast turkey, plum-pudding, &c.

Mr. BOREMAN. Mr. President, if the picture presented by the Senator from Michigan is a correct one as to the effect of the sitting of Congress for three weeks, it seems to me the sooner we adjourn the better. He says that we have injured the country, alarmed the public mind, and have effected absolutely nothing. I do not agree with him in his statements in this regard; but if they be true, it would be well, probably, that we should adjourn finally.

I confess that I cannot appreciate the objections that have been made to the proposed adjournment. I have been here three or four years, and every year whenever this motion has been made to adjourn over the holidays we have had these announcements of alarm and distress in the country; everything was going to pot; the country would go to destruction if we took a recess over the holidays; and nevertheless we have usually done so and the country went on just about as well as if we had remained here. Every gentleman in this body must know that if we were to remain here over the holidays we should effect, in the language of the Senator from Michigan, absolutely nothing. We all know that for at least ten days during the holiday season nothing can be done. We might come here with a dozen members, stay half an hour or an hour and adjourn from day to day during the holidays—that would be all—nothing more. Many members have made their arrangements to go home. They will go whether we take a recess or not. They will not be here to participate in the consideration and action that may be had; and it seems to me that in matters of so much importance it would be well to have the larger portion of the members of this as well as of the other branch of the national legislature present.

Now, sir, the question of the bankrupt law must be felt by all of us as one of very great importance. The framers of the Constitution thought it of so much importance that they incorporated a provision of the National Constitution declaring that Congress should have the power to do this thing, and thereby, I believe, according to the prevailing opinion, the States are excluded from the enactment of a bankrupt law. As has been repeated here by many honorable Senators, every time that we have had a serious panic in the country, every time we have had a financial crisis, the resort has been to a bankrupt law, not so much for the relief of the creditor class as for the relief of the debtor class, those who voluntarily avail themselves of the provisions of such a law, and they may come here and appeal to us as well as the creditor class. They have rights, and it is not proper for us to go hot haste and repeal this law out and out, thereby depriving the great mass of debtors in this country of its beneficial provisions.

Sir, if we repeal this law absolutely, and you keep these men in insolvency, subject to be harassed the remainder of their lives, a clamor would come up for the reinstatement of some of the provisions of this law. I think we ought to consider as well those who wish to avail themselves of the voluntary clause of the law as those who wish to get rid of the rigorous provisions of the law by compelling bankruptcy.

I admit that this law ought to be amended. There are some of its provisions that seem to me exceedingly rigorous and severe. That clause which says that if a man is indebted on commercial paper for fourteen days after it becomes due, and does not pay, he may, if he owes $250, be put into bankruptcy, is certainly very severe, and I think very unjust. That ought to be amended. There are some other provisions of the thirty-ninth section of the act which ought to be amended, and which might be amended, if we could agree, in a very short time.

But we were informed by the members of the Judiciary Committee yesterday that this subject had been before them for three long weeks; they had been considering it during all that time, and they have not yet up to this moment been able to mature an amendment to the law which is satisfactory to that committee; and yet we are told here that this thing which the Judiciary Committee could not fix up in three weeks is to be done all right according to the best interest of this country here during the festivities of the holidays.

Sir, I am willing to remain here if we have any assurance that during the next ten days, or during the holidays, we can perfect a measure that will be satisfactory. I am willing now to vote in two minutes to repeal some of the rigorous provisions of this law; but other members may not be satisfied, may not be convinced, that I am right in this proposition. They may think that some other provisions ought to be modified or repealed that I would think ought to remain. We do not know when we are to get a report from this committee. We cannot tell. They have not yet agreed. But suppose they make their report. That committee, in the quiet of their room, have been discussing the subject for three weeks, and now we are told that if we sit four or five days possibly we shall be able to pass this bill. I am sure this cannot be done.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment? I do not like to interfere with the Senator, but I ask him to yield with a view of inquiring what is the precise question before the Senate at the present moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to postpone the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance, and proceed to consider the resolution in regard to the recess.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On the finance resolution, then, my honorable friend is discussing the question of the bankrupt bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is what the Chair is compelled to understand, from the fact that every Senator is to judge of what is pertinent to the question before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then do I understand that everything except the merits of the question under consideration is open to discussion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The merits of the subject to be postponed may be discussed, and every Senator is the exclusive judge of what is pertinent to that question. The Senator from West Virginia is therefore in order.

Mr. BOREMAN. Mr. President, I think the remarks of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] were very appropriate, and I merely rose to indorse what he so well said on this subject. I did not expect to make any extended remarks.

But there is another reason why we are told this adjournment should not take place, and that is, that the finances ought to be regulated; that we gave the people of this country to understand in March, 1869, that we were going to come to specie payments some of these days; and, now, that this Congress, after four or five years have elapsed, ought at once to prepare and perfect and pass some measure which shall bring about that desirable end—an end which no doubt nearly all of us think is very desirable, but one I apprehend which will not be perfected for the next six months; for if there is an intricate subject, if there is one that everybody knows all about, and nobody knows anything about, it seems to me it is the subject of finance; and especially this thing of coming to specie payments. I think it is a very unfortunate circumstance that the Committee on Finance introduced the resolution on that subject at all; for if there has been any alarm in the country, it has not been because we were going to adjourn, but because this resolution has been introduced here, and has created trouble and difficulty in the country.

Now, sir, I have but one word more to say, and that is that I think the best thing we can do is to adjourn over. We may not be in a very good condition to mature legislation of so much importance as the bankrupt law during the holidays. We are not ready, according to the diversity of opinions here, to mature any scheme of finance. We are ready, I apprehend to go home—a good many of us, at least. I confess I shall be glad to do so.

I think, sir, that the very best thing we can do now is to adjourn, go home, and come back here ready for work after the holiday recess. The country will not go to destruction; and I am only sorry that our friends here should resist this resolution, and attempt to make us believe that if we go home during the holidays the country will go to ruin. I do not apprehend any such thing. I think we shall be doing the very best thing we can to go home, see our families, and come back here after the holidays prepared for more active work. I trust the resolution to adjourn will be taken up and passed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, the Senate of the United States a few days ago seemed to have a very decided opinion that there were some questions of public concern which required the attention of the Senate here for a few days longer, and some of those subjects were mentioned, and they seemed to impress the Senate that they were matters of public concern. I think that debate must have impressed upon the country the fact that there are some duties here now of an extraordinary character devolving upon the American Senate, duties not to be shirked, duties to be performed, and public obligations pressing upon Senators which cannot be easily put aside. I do not wish to say anything offensive, and certainly I shall not be supposed to say anything personal to anybody when I declare that when any Senator rises on his feet here at the present time, especially after this action of the Senate on a former day, and interposes his personal convenience against the public demand for doing something, he takes a responsibility which I think he will regret in the future.

Why, sir, what have we heard since the beginning of this session? That there was a demand, an instant demand, for some action upon the bankrupt system of the country. It is said from certain quarters that there is a demand for its instant repeal; that the suffering in regard to it is very great; that very great enormities are being perpetrated in consequence of the existence of that measure, and that at this time it is particularly oppressive; and, notwithstanding that cry, Senators here, who are representing certain constituencies from which it comes, tell you that they will turn a deaf ear to that, and that the charm of the holidays is so great that nobody can be expected, no patriotism is so high and exalted that it can be expected for a moment to withstand the temptation of the holidays, and that we must anticipate them by some four or five days to make preparation for a glorious spree.

But now, when men have made up their minds, in harmony with the usage, they say, (but which I assert never did obtain to this extent, God knows,) to have a "bust," as my honorable friend near me [Mr. MORTON] suggests, what is the use of talking about the sufferings of a suffering people? What becomes in this delirium of ours of the considerations of the people and the public interest? What of public concerns when my honorable friend from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] wants to go home, wants to spend the holidays in harmony with the ancient usages of the Senate? What is all that? And whoever was here yesterday to see the scenes that were enacted, the jolly faces in anticipation of the good time coming, Santa Claus, [laughter]—we are all converted into children, [laughter]—could see Santa Claus as in olden times, and notice all public concerns vanished from our vision, how willing and anxious we were to be oblivious to the facts. Then we saw all our friends on the other side voting for this adjournment. They have no responsibilities; there is nothing resting on them; the country is in admirable distress. I do not mean to say that they rejoice at the prospect; but they were for enjoying the holidays, certainly, never feeling better than with the prospect of a speedy adjournment. Having no responsibility themselves, understanding full well that the responsibility for whatever comes rests upon our shoulders, they of course thought this a particularly good time to adjourn. But, Senators of the majority, we have the responsibility, and we know that there are several matters of public concern which need to be considered; one of them will be reported to-day, as we have reason to expect and believe, and that is a bill in regard to the bankrupt law. Another is now before the consideration of the Senate, and that is the matter of the finances.

Mr. SHERMAN. And there is the salary bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The salary bill has been reported, and the chairman of the committee who reported it has given notice that he will seek at an early day, Monday next, to bring it up for the action of the Senate; and how anxious we have been to get at that. [Laughter.] Only get at it. [Laughter.] Do we want to draw another dollar out of the Treasury on that account? Have we not all been extremely anxious; has not this Congress been agonizing and praying for some relief on that salary bill and did not know how to do it; and have we not shown an extreme activity in all directions? Were ever men so confounded before to know how to do a thing that everybody wanted to do and in the end intended to do? [Laughter.] The House of Representatives have been able to be delivered of that, at least, as I infer. I have no reason to know what has been going on down there, but I infer from the results which came up here the other day; and within fifteen minutes after we had the information of that great fact in our history, there was an invitation to adjourn the next day. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I do not think we shall take up this resolution. I do not expect the American Senate, having voted against it by a majority of ten votes the day before yesterday, has become childish two days after and desires to take a holiday. I trust we shall go on and consider the public business.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, I voted the other day in favor of the motion to adjourn; I shall vote again to-day to take up the resolution to adjourn, and upon the question of its passage I shall vote in favor of it, and I do so entirely upon public considerations.

After this week, during the holiday period, is not a time when we ought to be passing bills of great public interest. At that period the Senate, we know as a practical fact, will be thin in numbers. Whatever conclusion we may come to upon this resolution, a large minority of our members at least will go home, and the measures which it is said are to be brought up for our consideration and which need our determination are measures of the very greatest importance, which the Senate ought to consider, if possible, when all its members are here and vote upon with a full attendance. The bankrupt law, as important as any statute upon our statute-book, ought not to be repealed, ought not to be seriously modified in the midst of an intense public excitement upon that subject, and perhaps, in part at least, factitiously created to bring about action by Congress which may be prejudicial to the nation. I do not believe that we ought to act upon the bankrupt bill until after the holidays, because I do not believe that we can act upon it with the deliberation, with the consideration, and with the full attendance of the Senate which the merits of the question demand. And so with regard to this financial resolution which is before us. It will indeed do no harm to stay here and talk about this resolution; but to undertake to enact measures affecting the finances of the country under such circumstances as we all know practically will surround us next week, is a thing that ought not to be done.

Therefore I believe it is better to act as practical legislators, in view of the understanding which has prevailed for many years with regard to a holiday recess occurring at this period, and of about the length of time, perhaps, indicated by the House resolution, and in contemplation of which every man of us makes his plans when he comes from home on the 1st of December to Washington. Now, to depart from our past usage in this respect, and undertake to derange plans which individual Senators have made, in respect to what must have been in their contemplation prior to the opening of the session, and to undertake to do important legislation in a very thin Senate, in my judgment would be unwise; and therefore, as I have said, I have voted, not for my convenience—for it does not make a straw's difference to me; I shall stay here through the holidays whether we have a recess or not—but I do think that the public interest demands that we shall not undertake to press these vital measures to a vote under the circumstances which will surround us during the next two weeks.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, when this question was up yesterday and the day before I voted in favor of the proposed adjournment; but I have since heard the remarks of the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL;] and as I always hear him with a degree of pleasure that it is impossible for me to express I have now come to the conclusion that I shall vote that way again. [Laughter.] I deduce from the honorable Senator's remarks a conclusion, which I trust is legitimately drawn, that some gentlemen are not afraid to go home and face their constituents and their wives, [laughter,] and some other gentlemen are a little shy upon that subject; and that some Senators, even of very mature age, are probably just as well satisfied to circulate in Washington City as in the vicinity of their natural-born wives and children during the holidays. [Laughter.]

In regard to another question, whether this body has done anything or not up to the present time—for I believe that was the position taken by the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] seriously. One thousand bills are now upon our tables; one thousand bills have been distributed and have been acted upon in part by the committees of the other body and those of this; and we know that more matured speeches have been uttered here in the first three or four days of this session than perhaps were delivered at any previous session in the last five or six years; and if the honorable Senator from Maine and myself have not had an opportunity of delivering those that we prepared, it argues nothing against the activity and the fidelity of our brother Senators.

As time is precious, and we are about to take this adjournment, and the House of Representatives will have to be informed of it, I shall not continue the argument. But we assume here that we are the legislative power of this Government. Are there not three hundred men in the House of Representatives, the immediate and honored and direct Representatives of the people, sending us repeatedly the very same resolution? And if they can face their constituents, having been so recently indorsed by them, I suppose it is possible for us to save ourselves; and if we cannot face our constituents we can remain in Washington if we have the privilege of doing so.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, when this question was before the Senate the other day I had some doubt about it, and I gave the benefit of that doubt against the adjournment. I cannot say precisely, as my friend from Nebraska has said, that after listening to the honorable Senator from Maine he concludes to vote as he has done heretofore, but I will say that the speech of my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] last night, among other reasons, induced me to change my vote; and I shall now vote to take the recess.

The speech of the Senator from Illinois, however, is not the only reason. Since the action of the Senate a few days ago I have taken the trouble to inquire of certain Senators, who voted with me at that time against a recess, as to whether they intended to remain here or not, and I find that the very patriotic gentlemen who are so eloquent against the recess propose to go home and leave the rest of us here without a quorum. If that is to be the case—and judging by all past experience it will be—I can see nothing to be gained by refusing the recess. And I wish to say with reference to it that I do not thus vote on account of any personal convenience to myself, as suggested by the honorable Senator from Maine. Should I consult my own personal convenience and preferences alone, I would prefer that the Senate should remain in session. If the recess be taken I presume that, with other gentlemen upon whom the Senate has devolved a certain public duty, I shall leave the city; but consulting my own feelings I very much prefer to remain, although I believe the business with which that committee is charged is important; and by reason of certain promises that have been made to the people of the South I feel under an obligation to go into that section of the country for the purpose of investigating one of the great questions of the day. Therefore, sir, not seeking my own personal convenience at all, not consulting my personal preferences, but consulting wholly my ideas of public duty, I shall vote for this recess.

A single word as to the position in which certain gentlemen on this floor seek to place some of us who favor the adjournment. The honorable Senator from Illinois last night charged that the Senate was unwilling, or had refused, to grant even two days' extension of time to consider the question of the bankrupt law; that, with the present necessities, to which he referred, upon us, we refused to vote an extension of even two days. I know of no such action on the part of this body. I have heard of no such vote. I certainly have not refused to extend the time for two or three days, nor has any other Senator, to my knowledge. That proposition has never been before the Senate; but those gentlemen who are so patriotic on this question did last night, for an hour or two, by dilatory motions, prevent us from acting on the adjournment question at all. Had the resolution been brought before the Senate last night, I have no doubt that an extension of two or three days would have been granted, if thereby anything could have been accomplished. I, for one, am quite willing that the recess shall take place on Monday next, and if we can have the assurance that any important measure can be acted upon in the mean time, I will vote for such an extension. But it is misrepresenting, unintentionally of course, the action of those republicans who voted as I did to say that we have refused to grant two or three days' extension of time. There has been no such vote taken.

On the other hand, when the House of Representatives send a resolution of this kind to us, we indefinitely postpone it, and refuse to act upon it at all. When we sought to call it up last night, and take the sense of the Senate upon it, what was the result? Dilatory motions; motions to prevent action upon the resolution itself. Let me say to gentlemen that a ten years' service in the House of Representatives has taught me that they expect their action to be treated with some slight degree of consideration and respect. If the Senate is opposed to granting this recess, after two resolutions of the kind have come from the House, passed there by a very large majority, let us say so squarely. If it be desirable to amend it so as to extend the time for two or three days, let it be done, and send the resolution back to the House for concurrence; but if a resolution of this kind is to be denied a respectful consideration, and then you expect the other branch of Congress to sit here during the recess, when they know, as you know, Mr. President, and as I know, and as I believe every other Senator knows, that there will not be a quorum here to do business, I can guarantee on the part of the House that you will not find a quorum there.

Now, sir, if you seek to do anything with reference to the bankrupt law, my impression is that the only thing that can be done is to take the bill that passed the House of Representatives and pass it here. I am in favor of its passage. You can act upon that within two hours, I take it; and if there be any further legislation necessary, when you come back again after the recess you can enact it. But, sir, if you seek to amend the bill of the House upon the subject of the bankrupt law by such provisions as have required our able Judiciary Committee to spend some three weeks of hard labor upon them, and yet, as said by the Senator from Virginia, they have not yet been able to agree upon them—if you expect you can amend it in that way, and receive the concurrence of the House of Representatives, you will find that the bill will not become a law until after the 1st of January. If you seek for relief, then, Senators, for that class of people who are oppressed, take up the House bill and pass it, and when you come back after the holidays deliberately re-enact such parts of the law as may be necessary.

Very much has been said about the will of the people on this subject. The Senator from Illinois last night, and other Senators, spoke eloquently about the wishes of the people, charging us with disregarding their wishes; and the honorable Senator from Illinois read us a very modest lecture upon our duties as Senators—an exceedingly modest lecture. For one, I appreciate the modesty of any Senator who gets up on this floor and reads to his peers a lecture as to their duty. I take it very kindly. I am glad that we have a censor over our consciences, and that there are those who are willing to tell us not only what their individual duty is, but also what my duty is. But, sir, I could not help, while he was speaking, comparing the parties to this question. On the one side is the House of Representatives, the direct representatives of the will and the wishes of the people of this country; on the other (and I mention it in confidence) are the candidates for the Presidency—the representatives of the people against the candidates for the Presidency—and the vote, when it comes, will show whether the candidates are in the majority. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. I did not know that we had a candidate from Minnesota.

Mr. President, I do not know whether there is any impropriety or not in delivering lectures to honorable gentlemen who are not desirous of hearing them, and who, perhaps, have a disinclination to follow them. Nor did I know before that I had ever lectured the Senate. I do know now that I am at least capable of making a convert, for my friend says I converted him last night. Now, let us understand what kind of a conversion this is. The Senator tells us that if it had not been for the speech made by me he would not have voted in favor of the adjournment. Now, let us come to the facts and see whether he or I be the most correct. When a resolution first came from the House for this adjournment over the holidays my honorable and distinguished and handsome friend from Minnesota was the gentleman who asked that it might be taken up from the table, and made a speech in favor of its adoption.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator is entirely mistaken. He will find no speech of mine in favor of its adoption.

Mr. LOGAN. Perhaps it was not a speech. I will take that back. The Senator, then, made a few remarks of a very ordinary character, if that will suit him better. [Laughter.] When the question came up again, I find my friend from Minnesota voting for the resolution again. Whether he voted against it last night or not I am not aware. He says, however, that my speech converted him. I believe it, and I look upon him now as a convert—not to the faith that is in me but merely to the faith that is not in him, out of perverseness, because he does not want to vote as I desire him to do.

Inasmuch as he is my convert I want to tell him a story about a convert. He is about such a convert—not exactly of the same character, but he is about as much converted as the one that I heard of once. I heard of an old minister once riding down the street, and there was a gentleman lying in the gutter. As the minister rode along he said to him, "How do you do?" The minister stopped. Said he, "My friend, you are in a bad condition." "Yes," was the reply; "I have joined the church; I am one of your converts." The minister rejoined, "I think so, for I do not think the Lord had anything to do with your conversion." [Laughter.] The Senator's conversion is of that character. He has been converted adversely to the proposition from something I said to him.

Sir, I do not see why it is that Senators are so desirous of trying to intimate before the Senate that some one here has said something very offensive to them, particularly to my friend from Minnesota. I certainly meant no offense to any one. I did say to the Senate last night, and I am glad I did say it, when I found the other side of the Chamber voting solid against an adjournment yesterday for the purpose of taking up the resolution to adjourn over the holidays, that they were acting as I would act if I were in their position. Why? Because, I said, there was no responsibility resting upon their shoulders, they being in the minority; the responsibility was with the majority, on this side of the Chamber. Was that offensive to my friend from Minnesota? Sir, the responsibility is with us. There was no untruth in that statement, nor was there any impropriety in it, because it is the fact, and I merely stated the fact. I did not presume that it would give offense to any of my friends on this side of the Chamber to merely state a simple proposition that is patent to every one; and I am certainly astonished that it should have given offense.

I said more. I said the importance of legislation at this time on the subject of the bankrupt law was greater to the people, and to us as their representatives, than the pleasure we might have during a few holidays. I further said that I was sorry to see an indisposition on the part of the Senate to grant the two days' extension that were asked by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. He stated to the Senate that he thought if the adjournment should be postponed until Tuesday next we would have ample time for the consideration of the report which would come from the Judiciary Committee on the bankrupt bill; and that statement was reiterated by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] He said that he thought if time were given them—he did not say until Tuesday, but if a short time were given them—they would report such a bill as would be favored by a majority of the Senate. I said things of this kind because I thought they were proper.

Now, I say to my friend from Minnesota that the idea of our action on this subject being of any great importance in politics hereafter is simply absurd as referring to myself or any others that may come within his suggestion or insinuation. I certainly should not have said one word on this question now if it had not been for the eloquent and able observations of my friend from Minnesota. For a gentleman of his great mind, so full of criticisms, to be so severe in his criticism, was almost enough to make a Senator wither like a leaf under the sun as it sends its heat upon it, which wilts it down and destroys its life and vigor. Why, sir, I felt as though I was almost sinking through the floor after the withering criticism of my friend from Minnesota. I really did not know his ability before.

Mr. WINDOM. I apologize to my honorable friend from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. The apology was accepted before it was made; it is all right. I only suffer under the criticisms; that is all.

But, Mr. President, enough of this. I have been actuated in what I have done in this matter by a sense of duty, and have stated the reason frequently here, when I have stated anything, that I, at least, as one of the representatives in this Chamber from the State of Illinois, had been called upon frequently by men who are entitled to respect, and whose opinions are worthy of consideration anywhere, to at least urge action on this measure. I hold in my hand a letter received this morning from one of the ablest jurists in the State of Illinois—a man having perhaps as extensive a practice of law in that State as any one in it—in which he urges upon me and says it is of great importance to at least the constituency there, that action of some character should be taken in reference to this bill that is now before the Judiciary Committee awaiting their report. These considerations are those that have actuated me and urged me on in what I have done, considering it a part of my duty to prevent an adjournment until we can at least consider this measure before Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. LEWIS] to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the resolution of House of Representatives providing for a recess for the holidays.

Mr. MORTON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Clayton, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Schurz, Stevenson, Stockton, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Windom—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Crozier, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamlin, Howe, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pratt, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sumner, Thurman, West, and Wright—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Conover, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Jones, Patterson, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Stewart—10.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following concurrent resolution, received yesterday from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, the 19th instant, they shall stand adjourned until Monday, the 5th day of January next.

Mr. THURMAN. I only rise to express my own individual hope that we may take a vote now on the resolution without any debate. I suppose every Senator has made up his mind whether he will vote for the resolution or not, and it is only a waste of time, it seems to me, with due respect to what others may think, to occupy the day with a discussion whether we will adjourn this evening or not. If a majority of the Senate are determined to take this recess it does not comport with the usage of the Senate to prevent their action by dilatory motions or the like. That has not been the custom of the Senate. If, on the other hand, a majority of the Senate are opposed to the resolution, let it be known. I, for one, in order that I may be engaged elsewhere, agree to the decision of the Senate, and still hoping that the resolution may be voted down, express my own wish that we should take the vote without debate.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I shall occupy but a single moment. I attempted to get the floor last night during the debate, but failed to do so; and I tried again this morning without success. The object of my seeking the floor was to call attention to a remark that was made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] last night, and by some other Senators, and which, I think, is getting quite too common in this Chamber; and that is, that gentlemen who belong to the minority of this body have no responsibility. One Senator said last night that if he belonged to the minority of the body he would do as we were doing; that we had no responsibility; and the Senator from Maine reiterated the remark in so far as to say, turning around to us, that we had no responsibility.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will allow me, my remark was not quite so unqualified as that. If the Senator will take my remarks in connection, I said that the responsibility was not on that side but was on this side. I hope the Senator will do me the justice to say that I meant to say as much as that and no more.

Mr. STOCKTON. I certainly had no intention of doing the Senator from Maine injustice, and I am very glad indeed to have him explain it in that way; and permit me to say in addition that I do not believe any Senator on this floor who made that remark meant it in the sense which will be attributed to it. I think when attention is called to it that remark will not be repeated by any Senator of this body. I was led to believe when I came to the Senate that I had as much responsibility as any other Senator——

Mr. LOGAN. I presume the Senator from New Jersey alludes to myself when he says the remark was made last night that there was no responsibility on that side of the Chamber. I did say so, having reference to political responsibility, not to individual or senatorial responsibility. I meant responsibility as a party—as a political organization.

Mr. STOCKTON. I have no doubt that was the sense in which the Senator from Illinois meant it.

Mr. LOGAN. That was the sense in which I meant it, and I so stated in my remarks.

Mr. STOCKTON. I have no doubt that was the sense in which the Senator stated it; but I rose to say that this was a question which was no party question; that this was a question which has not divided the Senate as a party question; that this was a question which could not divide the Senate as a party question, and that therefore, in any sense, in my judgment, every member of this body had his full share of the responsibility. And I was about to say when interrupted by the Senator from Illinois that since I have been a member of this body I have felt a responsibility, first, to my conscience, and then to the Legislature which elected me, for every vote that I have given in the Senate; and no vote has been given because I belonged to a political party which was a minority and had no responsibility. And I do believe that on this side of the Chamber, small as we are in numbers now—and we were much smaller, sir, when I first came here—there is no occasion where the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber have not remembered their responsibilities, whether they were political or as Senators, to the country.

This question, Mr. President, as I said before, is no political question; it is a question which properly antagonizes itself with no measure before this body. I desire very much to see several bills passed which are before the Senate. When I know that the Navy Department are fitting out some of their largest vessels, some of which require from 600 to 800 men to man them, and see a bill introduced authorizing the temporary increase for one year of the Navy by 1,500 men, a matter of necessity, and see that bill laid aside, and see a proposition for a recess for fifteen or sixteen days, I might rise in the Senate and depict the necessity of that measure and find fault with gentlemen who do not see it in the same light; but I have not done so, because I do not think it is right or fair to antagonize any particular measure which I, perhaps more than some other Senators, may think is important to the interests of our country, against a proposition to take an ordinary recess, which has been the common custom of the country from time immemorial. Therefore, when gentlemen on both sides of the chamber, of both political parties, bring to my mind the fact that by taking a recess we may interfere with the speedy repeal of the bankrupt act, I do not think that I can permit issue to be joined on that point. It is to disclaim that issue that I have risen.

I do not believe that there is any man in this body who desires the repeal of the objectionable features of the bankrupt law more than myself, and when Senators ask why it is that there is such hot haste, such a great desire to repeal the involuntary features in that act, let me say this: The law was passed in 1867; was thought to be a good law, and it was probably passed in anticipation of panics and bad times; and when asked why it should be so necessary, before the holidays, to repeal it, perhaps the legal gentlemen of the Senate might answer themselves if they would look to the decisions of the courts as to the construction of that law. It is quite doubtful whether it was intended by the body passing that law that every act or piece of evidence which went to show that a man was a bankrupt or in a bankrupt condition should be considered as a substantive act of bankruptcy. It is quite doubtful whether that was the intention of the act, and yet it is not doubtful before the courts under the present law.

Therefore I say that I agree with the Senator from Michigan who spoke yesterday; I agree with the Senator from Michigan who spoke to-day; I agree with my learned and distinguished friend from Ohio who spoke yesterday, that the speedy repeal of this law, or such modification of it as will take away the hardships which now exist under it, and the wrongs which are daily being perpetrated, is a matter vital and important. And now, Mr. President, how is that to be done? The House of Representatives have passed a bill, and that bill, it is stated to the Senate, repeals in a great measure, if not entirely, the existing law. That bill, after some debate, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who, it is said, have charge of the whole subject. The Committee on the Judiciary, we are told by the Senator from Ohio and by its chairman, have been laboriously engaged in examining the subject. I doubt it not, sir. They always do their duty, sick or well, whether there is much business or little before them, well and faithfully. I doubt not they are laboring—to what end? Laboring to perfect a bill, laboring to bring a bill before us which will stand the test of time, laboring to bring a bill before us which the people will not ask to have repealed when the time of trouble comes, when a bankrupt act is required. I doubt not that when they have sufficient time to examine this question, they can report a bill which will be a valuable bill, and a bankrupt act in some form may be passed. But remember what the Senator from Michigan said; remember what the Senator from Ohio said; remember how he told us that before the holidays this thing must be done. Remember what Senators have said on this floor, that it must be done before we leave here, because day after day this wrong is going on.

Then what shall we do? The Senator from Ohio, thought possibly that by Monday night, if a report was made this morning, we might go on with the bankrupt bill. Many other Senators say they want to so amend that bill as to perfect it. The committee have not yet reported; and it is hardly conceivable that a matter of so much importance brought before this body can be acted upon for several days, even if it were here now and the committee were agreed upon it. Then what shall be done, and what course shall be taken by those Senators who have depicted to us the horrors of the bankrupt law until they have convinced me that they are right? What lead will they make which I am to follow? If they want the law repealed, there is only one way in which it can be done; that is, by discharging the committee from its further consideration of the House bill, taking it up, and passing it, and then instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to go on with their labors, and by the time we come back report a bill which will stand the test of time, amending the bankrupt system of the country. If the evils are so great, if the virus is so poisonous that you are afraid for it to remain longer in the system, then cut it out at once while you are preparing your other report.

Now, Mr. President, practically, (having stated distinctly that I shall not vote in favor of this recess for the purpose of opposing the passage of that bill,) I can see no other way for its speedy passage than to take up the bill sent to us by the House, if for no other reason, that the danger is so imminent and the peril so great, because it is a House bill, and afterward pass such a bill as we think proper and send it to the House, well considered and entire.

The Senator who spoke to-day, from Michigan, said that we had been three weeks here and had done nothing. In view of what was said by other Senators on the floor, I may reply to him that the responsibility is not ours, for they free us from responsibility; and the Senator from Maine with great earnestness spoke of Senators going to their Christmas festivities and leaving the public business alone. He spoke of a "Christmas bust;" I think that was his expression. I think, after the remarks of the Senator from Delaware, few, pointed, and touching on that subject, the Senator from Maine might have spared us the connection of a "bust" and a "spree" with the most sacred day known to Christians. There are some men that seek their Christmas holiday for other purposes than "busts" or "sprees," and I will venture to say that those men who do seek their Christmas because, as the Senator from Delaware said, it was a holiday, a time-honored custom, will not be outdone by those who look upon it in another light in their devotion to the public service; nor will they be outdone in their disposition to take the full responsibility that the people of this country and their constituents may put on them for asking for this recess.

Thus much, Mr. President, was due to myself, having voted in silence in favor of the recess, and having cast my vote to bring the question up this morning. I do believe that if this law is so imminent, so perilous that it must be immediately repealed, it can be done this morning. If the gentlemen who have the responsibility desire to do it, let them move to discharge the committee and pass the House bill, and I will vote with them. If, on the contrary, it is not so perilous, and if it is better to take time to consider before acting on that subject or passing the House bill, then the result follows naturally that we had better allow those gentlemen who desire to go to their homes to pass their Christmas as they may, to do so, and come back afterward to transact the public business.

As for myself, I trust I never have permitted any personal matter, particularly a matter of enjoyment or pleasure, to interfere with my public duties. Even if I was willing so to do, I am not placed at present in that temptation. To me it matters not whether Congress adjourns or not, for my Christmas will be passed in Washington.

I know, however, that there are many of our body whose homes are within reach of this spot, whose homes are waiting for them, and who will not be the worst Senators nor the less capable of doing their duty when they return because they bring back with them the hallowed influence of a home Christmas.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I have received, perhaps, as many urgent telegrams and letters bearing upon this subject as any other Senator upon the floor, and up to this moment I have refrained from saying one word upon it in the hope of reaching a speedy determination of the question whether we are to have a holiday recess as long as usual, or whether we are to make an effort to modify the bankrupt law. It is very plain that there is where the question lies.

In referring the bill sent us by the House to the Judiciary Committee, it was manifest that the Senate expected to make the effort to modify the bankrupt law, and I favored that movement for the reason that I honestly think there are thousands of those who are to-day clamoring for the repeal of the bankrupt law, who, if the next six months should not bring the realization of the hopes which they entertain to-day, will be the most thankful men in the Union for the existence of a bankrupt law. I wish to save it, and I wish to save it not because any one who has written to me is a candidate for President of the United States. Those for whom I speak do not stand in that category. Let me read, sir, one extract, but a sentence, from one of the numerous letters I have received, to show who are the men that are asking us to remain for a few days and endeavor to modify this law. One gentleman writes to me:

> For weeks we have had 92 per cent. of our creditors in amount to sign an agreement of settlement, but for want of getting the balance of 8 per cent. we must inevitably go down.

Another man writes me that he has at least $800,000 over his indebtedness in real estate and property, and yet he has a few small creditors who are clamoring to put him into bankruptcy! Now, sir, it is not for the candidates for the Presidency that I am here to speak, but for the 92 per cent. of honest creditors and against the 8 who in these times would seek the last drop of blood from their unfortunate debtors. Here they are, sir, the creditors upon the one side, who wish to have the estates of their debtors so administered as to realize something to the debtors themselves, and on the other, both asking us for a modification of this law; and the simple question is, will we make the effort to modify it for them and save them?

I am willing to stay here for some days to make that effort. If it fails, I may be driven into voting for the repeal of this law for the purpose of obviating its operation for the next few months, for Senators should remember that it is this panic which is revealing the harsh and the oppressive features of this law, and they should remember, too, that while the holidays are running the notices in bankruptcy are running too. They do not take out the holidays in counting the notices which are to end in making these men adjudged bankrupts, and we ought to consider that if we could remain here for a few days, and bring perhaps a holiday to thousands, we seventy-two Senators ought to be willing to sacrifice a few of our holidays for that purpose. I shall stay until all hope of reaching a modification of the bankrupt law is lost, and then I may vote for its repeal if there be nothing better.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I do not perceive how men are to be injured and ruined by the mere fact of a few days' delay in the repeal or modification of the bankrupt law. What material difference can it make whether action upon it takes place to-day, to-morrow, or ten days hence? The Senate can at once repeal the bankrupt law by discharging the Judiciary Committee. Let any Senator who feels that—as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] does—a delay of a week may bring some of his constituents to ruin, rise in his place and move to discharge the committee and bring us to a direct vote on the House bill. The constituency of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be at once saved from pecuniary disaster if the repeal of the bankrupt law will have that effect. Now, allow me to tell that Senator with all frankness that there is no more chance to get a modification of the bankrupt bill, recess or no recess, in two weeks than I have to fly. A proper, just, and equable modification of the bankrupt law, if it is to remain, is a much more important and a much more difficult thing to accomplish than my friend from Pennsylvania imagines. I have seen, Mr. President, some little service in both Houses of Congress, and I can truthfully avow that I have never seen a committee labor more faithfully, more constantly, more earnestly, than the Judiciary Committee of the Senate have labored on proposed amendments to this measure, and they have not as yet been able to mature a bill. They are trying to do so, they are willing to do so, but the difficulties are much more formidable than gentlemen suppose. If this bankrupt law is to be amended, it must be amended in such points as will protect both creditors and bankrupts against the spoliation of those described by the Senator from Pennsylvania as willing to take the last drop of blood. Amendments must be so framed and agreed upon that while the law shall not be used as a harsh and oppressive agency for collecting debts, it shall not be a cover for fraud or fraudulent preferences of the bankrupt for one class of creditors over another. Some such general, equable principle of justice alike to creditor and debtor must be adopted if the law stands. There is a bitter opposition to the present bankrupt law. Under its involuntary feature as well as under its voluntary, the popular belief is that injustice and wrong have been committed. We have accordingly seen the unanimity with which the repeal of the measure passed the House. I do not know what the sentiment of the Senate is upon this subject of repeal or modification. I am satisfied, however, and I make the prediction that, recess or no recess—and I do not wish to attempt to induce any Senator to vote one way or the other upon that subject—there will be no modification of the bankrupt law and no vote on that question for three weeks to come. You cannot get a concurrence of opinion on such a subject in a day, and whenever the Judiciary Committee report, we shall have a debate, in my judgment, in the Senate of more than two weeks' duration. If you take no recess, action upon the measure would be postponed until after the 1st of January, and you would have gained nothing.

It occurs to me therefore that it would be a wiser and better thing for the Senate to postpone the consideration of the report until after our return. No one doubts that we shall have a holiday. Let us defer the consideration of this important subject until that recess is over. The members of the committee will have more time to consider the proposed amendments, and the Senate will be better prepared to act calmly, wisely, and with more deliberation. The legal minds of the Senate will be brought to examine the report of the committee and to point out any errors which may have escaped their observation. The debate in the Senate may tend to enlighten the House upon the impolicy of a total repeal.

The proposed amendments must look to the protection of no particular class of creditors at the expense of another, if their adoption is to be hoped for. Nor can one or more creditors expect longer to use this law for the oppression of unfortunate debtors. I am ready to-day to vote for the repeal of the bankrupt law; and yet amendments may be proposed and arguments adduced which might change my opinion and induce me to prefer a modified bankrupt law, conservative in its tendency and just in its provisions, as a remedy for existing evils, to a total repeal. The Senate knows that there is great distrust of and opposition to the present bankrupt law. Let us be considerate and wise in our proposed action. If the question were to come up to-day, and I am forced to vote, I should vote for the House bill; and yet I do not desire to vote rashly in a matter of so much public importance. No Senator knows better than my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] the danger of rash legislation at any time and under any circumstances. It seems to me it would be especially unfortunate upon a measure in which the interests of so many are involved.

I am perfectly willing, Mr. President, that the Senate shall come to a vote on this resolution. I am ready and willing to stay during the holidays, however anxious I may have been for the recess. I shall, I hope, never see the day when I cannot cheerfully acquiesce in any judgment of the Senate, and cheerfully my opinions and action yield to whatever a majority of my brethren of the Senate shall decide, however much I may have opposed such action.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of inquiring if the resolution from the House, now before us, is at this time the subject of amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to amend the resolution by substituting the words "Monday, the 22d," for "Friday, the 19th instant," where those words occur in the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to inquire of the mover of the amendment, whether he thinks that extending the session until Monday will enable us to pass a bill in regard to the bankrupt law.

Mr. INGALLS. It was my understanding from the Judiciary Committee, that they probably would be able to report at a very early day amendments upon the subject of the bankrupt act, that would meet with the approbation of the Senate; and for one, recognizing as I do, the necessity of some early action on that subject, I am willing to wait here for the purpose of ascertaining what that report will be, in order that if possible we may agree upon some act for its modification. If it cannot be modified, for one, I am in favor of its unconditional and absolute repeal.

Mr. THURMAN. It is proper that I should say that I now believe the Judiciary Committee can report the bill to-day. I will not undertake to indicate at what hour it can report, but I am satisfied from information which I have received since yesterday, since this matter was before the Senate, in conversation with numerous members of the House, and influential members too, that it is utterly idle to talk about a bill amending the bankrupt law passing the House of Representatives between now and Tuesday. I will therefore say to my friend from Kansas, that if that is his idea, there is no use in amending this resolution.

What is said by the Senator from Kentucky is literally true; it has come to be so. The question is, shall we have no recess at all, and go on and offer amendments to the bankrupt law, and submit them to the consideration of the Senate, or shall the committee be discharged from the consideration of the House bill, and the Senate agree to take the vote upon that bill? That is the only alternative; and, therefore, Senators may as well vote with that knowledge before them. It is perfectly clear that, let us report amendments ever so acceptable to the Senate in regard to the bankrupt bill—it is perfectly certain, I think, from the conversations I have had with numerous members of the House, and influential members too, that there is no hope of those amendments being agreed to in the House between now and Tuesday.

I therefore repeat that there is but one of two things to do, either take no recess at all, or discharge the Judiciary Committee from the consideration of the House bill, and bring the Senate to a vote upon it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the suggestion has been made several times in debate here that we might with propriety now take up the bankrupt law and repeal it. It is possible that some may think favorably of the proposed action. The statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, as to the great hardship which the law may work during the contemplated recess of Congress, and the general wish to relieve the country from the evil effects of some of the provisions of the law, may lead the Senate to act hastily as to that law.

I only wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in any modification of the bankrupt law made after the recess, and when we come together, there is no difficulty in making that modification relate back to the present or to any anterior date, so that any proceedings taken during the recess to the oppression of either debtors or creditors can, by our amendments, be relieved. I do not know that I violate the rules in stating so much of the deliberations of the Committee on the Judiciary as to say that that committee have already taken the retroaction of its amendments into consideration, and certain contemplated modifications of the law, if reported to-day, would relate back to a day now in the past. So the Senate, I trust, perceive that there is no necessity for repealing the bankrupt law in hot haste for fear of injury which might be done either to debtor or creditor during the contemplated recess.

I wish to make one more remark on this subject of repeal. I fear that the unconditional repeal would at this time be disastrous to the country. As I understand the law, no State insolvent law now affects existing contracts; State insolvent laws must always be prospective, not retroactive. The bankrupt law, by the Constitution, is made the supreme law, and suspends all State insolvent laws. Now, if we repeal the bankrupt law, the State insolvent laws revive, but it is at least a grave question whether they would affect any contracts existing when the State law so revived. I incline to believe that existing contracts would be without relief. And if the State insolvent laws, when they revived, would not affect existing contracts there would be no possibility of relief by State legislation. Such a result would leave the country, in its present financial difficulties, in a bad condition.

I assure the Senate that, so far as I have considered this subject, the question of repealing the bankrupt law deserves their careful consideration. I am ready to stay here day by day and consider and perfect the law, but I hope the Senate will not be tempted by the desire to dispose of this subject, so as to adjourn, into hasty legislation, for that might lead to the serious injury of the country.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I wish to say that I have not been actuated in favoring this adjournment by any hostility to a repeal of the bankrupt law, or a modification of it; but I have felt from the beginning that if we staid here, perhaps, until New Year's day, there would be no material alteration in the bankrupt law, unless we took up the House bill and passed it as it came to us.

Now, if the condition of the debtor portion of the community is such as it has been represented to the Senate, by the Senator from Pennsylvania to-day, and by the Senator from Illinois yesterday evening, then, perhaps, it may be proper to take up this bill that came to us from the House and pass it; and I am free to say that I am ready to vote now for the House bill repealing that law, leaving it to the judgment and wisdom of the Senate and House of Representatives hereafter to enact a law that will promote the general interests of the people of this country.

I was aware in the beginning that, if there were any material modification of that law attempted or reported to us by the Judiciary Committee, it would fail to meet the assent of this Senate, much less the assent of both Houses of Congress until the time when we should be back from the recess. Therefore, in casting my vote to take up the resolution and to pass it, I have not been actuated by any spirit of hostility to such a measure; and yet it seemed to me that remarks were made yesterday evening which might at least render it necessary for us to disclaim any such hostility to the measure. We are ready, at least I for one am ready, to meet any pressing wants of the debtor portion of the community by at once repealing the bankrupt law by the enactment of the bill that came to us from the House.

I simply rose to make this explanation, not with any desire to protract this debate.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, I have voted uniformly against the recess. I have done so in the hope that we might amend the bankrupt law upon the suggestions that have been made by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. I no longer entertain the hope that that can be done. I am opposed to the repeal of the bankrupt law, and believe that the discussion of the question of its repeal is fraught with great evil to the country. I venture to say that the repeal of the bankrupt law will be followed by financial evils much more wide-spread and disastrous than any that will come from its continuance in the present form. I am persuaded, moreover, by information, general and special, which I have received, that there will be large expression of a general public sentiment among the commercial classes against its repeal and in favor of its amendment if time be allowed. I only wish, therefore, to say that I design now to vote for the recess at the earliest practicable moment consistent with other public purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs, Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

Mr. MORTON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to have the resolution reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, the 19th instant, they shall stand adjourned until Monday, the 5th of January next.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Cameron, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stockton, Tipton, and Windom—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Brownlow, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Crozier, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pratt, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sumner, and West—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Jones, Patterson, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Wright—13.

So the resolution was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 131) for the relief of John Colter;

A bill (H. R. No. 826) for the relief of Elias C. Boudinot; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by Edward Young of a present from the Emperor of Russia.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 16) providing for a change in the name and title of the agent and consul-general of the United States at Alexandria; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

THE BANKRUPTCY LAW.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed that in any bill they may report in regard to the bankrupt law, whether for its repeal or amendment thereto, such repeal or such amendments as relate to the acts, causes, or conditions by virtue of which any person may be thrown into involuntary bankruptcy, shall be made retroactive, to date back and to take effect at a period not later than the 1st of December, 1873.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MORTON. As the Senate has now resolved to adjourn, I desire that through this resolution the Senate will give notice to the country that the proceedings in bankruptcy which may be commenced hereafter or which shall have been commenced since the 1st of December shall be made subject to such modifications or repeal of that law as may take place hereafter.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask if this debate is in order? Here is an important proposition——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is objection made to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MORTON. What is before the Senate? Nothing but my resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Committee on Finance is the unfinished business.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand the Senator's resolution is one of instruction to the Judiciary Committee. Of course it will be debated; it must be voted on——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If any Senator objects to the consideration of the resolution to-day it must lie over. Does the Senator from Massachusetts object?

Mr. SUMNER. I object.

The PRESIDENT. Objection being made to its present consideration, the resolution must lie over.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 131) for the relief of John Colter—to the Committee on Finance;

The bill (H. R. No. 826) for the relief of Elias C. Boudinot—to the Committee on the Judiciary; and

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by Edward Young of a present from the Emperor of Russia—to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending an appropriation for the compensation of an operator for the Capitol telegraph; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of War, in relation to a contract entered into for the treatment of patients in the Providence Hospital; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER LEVEES.

Mr. CLAYTON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River be authorized to sit at such places as they may designate during the holiday recess, and to investigate and report upon the subject of the levees; and that the actual and necessary expenses attending such investigation be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let me make one statement, if you please. Will my friend from Michigan allow me to make one statement in a few words only?

Mr. CHANDLER. I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. The resolution of the Finance Committee being before the Senate as the regular order, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-nine minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned till Monday, January 5, 1874.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 19, 1873.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask that, by unanimous consent, the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The Journal was then approved.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. SENER submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on War Claims be instructed to inquire, first, as to the expediency of extending the time within which loyal adherents to the Government of the United States during the late war may file their claims, in conformity to the act of March 3, 1871; second, as to the expediency of providing by law some general plan of compensation for losses and injuries resulting to religious, charitable, and educational institutions, during the late war, from acts of the armies of the United States; third, as to the expediency of increasing the number of commissioners of claims, under the act of March 3, 1871, from three to five, so as to facilitate the work of said commission and enable said commission to bring their labors to as speedy a termination as may be consistent with the public interest.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That Professor James D. Dana be, and hereby is, appointed as one of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than members of Congress, in place of Theodore D. Woolsey, of Connecticut, who declines to be reappointed.

Mr. KELLOGG. I trust there will be no objection to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest that it be referred to the Board of Regents.

Mr. KELLOGG. If there be any objection I will not press the resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not suppose there is any objection, but I only suggest that is the usual course.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the usual course is as stated by the gentleman from Ohio, I do not object.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is another vacancy to be filled, occasioned by the death of Professor Agassiz.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not suppose there would be the least objection, Professor Dana being so well known; but if that is the usual course, I do not object.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I suggest that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

There was no objection, and the resolution was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

JUDGE E. H. DURELL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Before I proceed with the civil-rights bill, I desire to submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and on which I shall ask to be permitted a moment's explanation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, authorized to send a sub-committee of two members of said committee to New Orleans for the purpose of taking testimony in the matter of the impeachment of Judge E. H. Durell, heretofore referred to said committee, and that said sub-committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ a stenographer.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say that there are among the charges against Judge Durell charges of misapplication of funds and misproceedings in bankruptcy. Unless this resolution be adopted, it would require all the bankrupt records to be brought up here before the committee, or copies, at an immense expense, and there would be such a consumption of time that we probably would never get through the investigation; and although no single member—I am sure I do not want to go and am not going—although no single member of the Judiciary Committee desires to go on this errand, yet we have been compelled, by a sense of public duty, to ask for this, which will effect a great saving of expense. It is in the interest of true economy, I assure the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why is not the gentleman content to send a committee of one?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We are going to send a committee of two, one for each side, that there may be fair play.

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] intend to bring up the civil-rights bill this morning?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; this morning.

Mr. MAYNARD. How much time does he propose to allow for debate?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Two hours; an hour before and an hour after the calling of the previous question. And I will give most of that time to the opponents of the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would suggest to the gentleman that he might extend the debate somewhat longer than that. There are a number of gentlemen who desire to speak upon the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Two hours will bring us to between three and four o'clock, and then the votes on the bill and amendment will keep us as late as we usually stay here.

Mr. MAYNARD. There is a gentleman here who has not been with us during the last few years, who will no doubt desire to be heard.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will take care of that gentleman. He will have all the time I can give him.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I object to anything but the regular order.

Mr. CESSNA. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. Mr. MAYNARD has just objected to anything except the regular order.

Mr. CESSNA. I had obtained the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to yield to me, and had not the slightest idea that the gentleman from Tennessee was to raise an objection.

The SPEAKER. But he has raised an objection, and the Chair must recognize it.

Mr. CESSNA and Mr. MAYNARD rose.

The SPEAKER. When the regular order has been called the Chair must enforce it. No colloquies on the floor in regard to enforcing it are in order.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire now to call the attention of the House to the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. What arrangement, if any, can be made about the time to be allowed for debate on the bill?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I had proposed to have an hour before calling the previous question, of which I proposed to take only ten minutes myself. The rest of the hour I proposed to divide among the opponents of the bill. And after the previous question is seconded I propose to give a large portion of the remaining hour to the gentleman from Georgia, who has asked me for it; and I then propose to take to myself the few minutes remaining of the hour in advocacy of the bill.

Mr. BECK. I wish to say, at the request of a number of gentlemen on this side of the House, that we do not intend to have any dilatory motions if we can help it. We do not intend to obstruct the fair hearing of this bill. But at the same time we do not intend, if we can help it, to be denied the right to debate except so far as the gentleman in charge of the bill may see fit to peddle out his time to us. It is a question that cannot be discussed at all in a few minutes. I hold in my hand the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the New Orleans slaughter-house cases, which no man can present clearly to the House in less than half an hour.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot yield for an argument.

Mr. BECK. Let me say just one word before I sit down, that I may not have occasion to rise again in regard to this point. If the gentleman insists upon holding his hour and peddling it out, and then his next hour, and peddling that out, and cutting off debate in that way, I think this side of the House has power, by what you may call filibustering, to prevent it, and it cannot be done till Monday morning. We want fair discussion, and we will make no dilatory motions except to secure honest debate. There are a dozen gentlemen here who want to be heard, and the bill ought to be discussed certainly for two days. Hitherto it never has been discussed in this House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say to the House, and especially to gentlemen on the other side of the House, that just so long as this debate can run consistently with the passage of the bill to-day, just so long, up till ten minutes past nine o'clock to-night, I am willing to let it run.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me a word?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly, sir; upon the question of an arrangement.

Mr. STEPHENS. It is simply upon the question of what length of time should be allowed for debate. I would make an appeal to him not to insist upon a vote to-day. I trust that the House in the discussion of so grave and important a question will not be hastened in coming to a vote, but that ample discussion will be allowed. I would propose two days. There is no necessity for any speed or haste. As the gentleman says he intends to allow me an opportunity of speaking upon the bill, I wish to read the memorial that was presented to the House yesterday from the late convention and that was ordered to be printed. I have not seen it; the House has not yet seen the grievances complained of. I do not intend to speak further now, but simply to appeal to the gentleman and to the House, that by common consent he shall allow at least two days' debate on this question, even if the action on it goes over till after the holidays. I state to him frankly that I do wish to be heard on this bill. I am in no condition to-day to be heard, not only for want of an opportunity of reading the document which is to be laid upon our tables, but for the further reason that I am not in a condition physically to speak to-day. Therefore, if the vote is pressed to-day I cannot do anything more than vote against the bill, and I should like much to give my reasons at large for that vote. I trust that at least two days will be allowed for the discussion on this question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire in all kindness, but with frankness, to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to what we who have been here before in late Congresses know well, that this bill has been, almost in the very words, before the late Congress for two sessions; it has been debated and discussed in many forms. To us this bill was linked with another one, to wit—general amnesty. On our side we desired general amnesty and civil rights to go hand in hand. They came out of and were part of the same transaction, and being a part of one and the same transaction, we thought that while we tendered to those who had sought to sever the Union the right hand of fellowship, we must also tender the strong arm of the Union to protect the rights of those who aided us in sustaining the Union at the same time. I call his attention to the fact that we upon this side—I myself rising in my place and saying that if the matter had been reported by a committee I would make no objection, for which some overzealous friends of mine are criticising my course—we on our side allowed general amnesty to go through without a word of debate and scarcely a protest.

Now, then, here is a bill which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] and myself reported from a committee at the last session, and faithfully tried to get a hearing upon. We failed by a proper use by the minority—mark me, I do not complain—of all those dilatory tactics which the minority have a right to adopt. Having failed then, we have now allowed amnesty to go forward; we have given precedence to the white race in that regard, and now we insist that the colored man shall have his rights enforced. While, therefore, I am willing to give all this day for debate, I think that is all that ought to be asked of the majority of the House. If I misinterpret the sentiment of the House, I certainly will not put my own individual opinion against any claim that may be made for courtesy. The only thing that has appealed to me in all the gentleman from Georgia has said is that which makes an appeal to me always—the statement that he is not physically in a condition to allow him to speak. I had arranged in my own mind to give him of the last hour, which belongs by courtesy to the chairman of the committee, forty minutes, reserving only ten minutes for myself.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Now, I was one of those who interrupted the passage of this bill, aided, of course, by all our friends on this side, but not to prevent a hearing; for the gentleman will remember that it was proposed to pass the bill without a hearing, without a single word of debate. I appealed in behalf of my friends, day after day, when the bill came up, that it should go to some committee and be reported back, so as to come before the House for discussion, and it was only for the purpose of discussion that we resisted the passage of the bill in the manner in which it was tried to be passed. It was attempted to pass it without a hearing, and, as the gentleman has said, we struggled against it as we had a right to do; we struggled, not to prevent the bill passing, but because it was attempted to pass it without a word of debate, and it was in the interest of debate, and debate only, that we struggled.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My friend is a little inaccurate in his recollection. The bill was reported from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. We could not be called in our order, and we asked consent to have it brought up for discussion. We failed to get that consent, and thereupon we tried it under a suspension of the rules, or rather under a call of the States, and we failed utterly, obstructing business all last session with it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It was not under a suspension of the rules. It was in the morning hour; and we only had to get rid of the morning hour to prevent its passage. We did it by calling for the reading in full of joint resolutions and bills, which had generally been read by the titles only at the Clerk's desk. We only made that resistance for the purpose of debate and of obtaining a hearing.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire now to enter a motion to recommit this bill. I will say that I will give the whole of this day to the discussion of this bill unless I am overruled by the House. I will not call the previous question at the end of the hour if the gentleman on the other side, to whom I surrender the floor without calling it, will agree to call it at the end of that hour. That will give two hours' debate before and one hour after the calling of the previous question.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DAWES. I ask my colleague to yield to me, in order that I may make a correction of a statement which I made the other day, so that the correction may go upon the record.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DAWES. In the debate the other day I stated, upon information that I had obtained from a member of the Committee on Appropriations of the last Congress, in looking around for places where the estimates could be cut down, that the estimates for fortifications were between twelve and fourteen million dollars, and that I thought there was a desire to cut them down to three or four million dollars. Since then my attention has been called to the estimates; and, upon referring to them, I find that my informant was mistaken; that the estimates for fortification, instead of being between twelve and fourteen million dollars, are $5,050,550; made up of $3,601,000 for seacoast fortifications, and $1,449,550 for Army fortifications. I desire to make that correction, and say that the statement I made to the House the other day was made upon information obtained from a member of the Committee on Appropriations of the last Congress.

ELIAS C. BOUDINOT.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to yield to me for the purpose of presenting for passage a bill of pressing necessity at this moment. It is one I am instructed unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary to report to this House and ask action upon it at this time. It is a bill for the relief of Elias C. Boudinot, a Cherokee Indian, against whom suits are pending for violation of the revenue laws. At the last session of Congress the Committee on the Judiciary reported a bill for his relief, providing for the dismissal of the suits against him, and for the return to him of the gross proceeds of his goods which had been sold, after deducting therefrom the taxes which he ought to pay. That bill passed the House and also passed the Senate, and went to the President in the last hours of the session. In the multitude of business pressing upon him he was unable to examine the bill for approval and signature.

So anxious is Mr. Boudinot to have a bill passed for his relief at this time—because the court is in session and his security may be made liable—that he has had presented here by some friend a bill simply to dismiss the suits against him. The Committee on the Judiciary, upon examination of the matter, although Mr. Boudinot is willing to have a bill passed simply to dismiss suit against him, think that justice and equity require the passage of the bill that was passed at the last session. They have therefore instructed me to report a substitute precisely in the same form as the bill which passed the two Houses at the last session and went to the President. I hope there will be no objection to it, because if it is to do any good it must be sent to the Senate for action immediately.

No fraud, no dishonesty, is charged against Mr. Boudinot. He little supposed that when he was selling tobacco in the Indian Territory he was violating the revenue laws. Indeed, in his desire not to violate them he was so careful that he addressed letters to two Commissioners of Internal Revenue, and both of them wrote back to him that the revenue laws would not be enforced in the Indian Territory. The case went to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court recommended this action by Congress.

No objection being made, the bill (H. R. No. 826) for the relief of Elias C. Boudinot was received and read a first and second time.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides that the civil proceedings now pending in the name of the United States against the property claimed by Elias C. Boudinot, for alleged violation of the internal-revenue laws, be discontinued and dismissed, and that the property seized and taken from him, and the gross proceeds of the sale of any such property on account of alleged violation of such laws, be returned and restored to him by the proper officers of the Government, provided that taxes legally due from and unpaid by said Boudinot in respect to the business shall have first been paid or deducted from the proceeds aforesaid.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not fully understand the explanation of the gentleman. I would ask if the bill now reported by the Committee on the Judiciary is the same that was reported by that committee during the last Congress.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It is the same.

Mr. HOLMAN. The terms of the bill are the same?

Mr. ELDREDGE. It is in precisely the same form as the one of last session. I took a printed copy of the bill of last session and have offered it as a substitute for the one introduced this session.

Mr. KASSON. Ought not the words "costs of suit" to be inserted before the word "taxes?" The bill proceeds upon the theory that Boudinot did violate the laws, and, therefore, the bringing of the suit is justifiable.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It was not even so far as that he had made a mistake. On the contrary, he wrote to the Commissioners and they informed him that the revenue laws would not be enforced over the Indian Territory in violation of a treaty. But the court held that they had jurisdiction, and he was held liable. The case went to the Supreme Court, where it was held that the law repealed the treaty, and thereby he was liable. At the same time they acquit him of all motive or disposition to violate the revenue laws in any particular. I do not think he ought to be required to pay any costs.

Mr. KASSON. If that is the position of the matter—if this man first took counsel of the executive officers and they advised him that he had the right to do as he did——

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is the fact.

Mr. KASSON. Then I will not ask any amendment.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be considered as read three times and passed.

There was no objection; so the bill was passed.

Mr. ELDREDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would like now to state to the House an arrangement to which I think all will agree. It is that this debate run on to-day in fifteen-minute speeches during such time as there may be after the morning hour; that the debate be continued under the same restriction on the first day after the recess, and also on the second day after the recess, until four o'clock, at which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered; the time to be equally divided between the two sides. If the House chooses to extend the time of any gentleman beyond fifteen minutes, of course it can be done.

Mr. STEPHENS. The arrangement proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts would be very acceptable to me, and I think to this side of the House, if he would say "thirty-minute speeches" instead of "fifteen-minute speeches." Some members would like to speak more than fifteen minutes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If any gentleman wants more than fifteen minutes the House would undoubtedly extend his time.

Mr. STEPHENS. With that understanding, the arrangement is perfectly acceptable.

Mr. BECK. I did not quite understand the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Is it that the debate be extended until the second day after the recess?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Until four o'clock of that day.

Mr. BECK. That seems to me very liberal; and the debate is to go on in thirty-minute speeches?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Fifteen-minute speeches; the time to be divided by the Speaker equally between the two sides, I retaining, of course, the right to the closing hour of the debate after the previous question has been seconded.

Mr. BECK. I do not want to speak myself; but I think the gentleman would be better satisfied, and so would the House, if the debate should go on in speeches of twenty minutes, instead of fifteen. This question can hardly be presented in fifteen minutes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If gentlemen prefer twenty-minute speeches, I assent.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have an amendment, which I would like to present.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have no objection to its being read; but let the Chair first state the arrangement, so that there may be no mistake.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts proposes that the debate shall be conducted under a rule of twenty-minute speeches, the previous question to be considered as ordered at four o'clock on the second day after the recess. That will reserve to the gentleman from Massachusetts the right to one hour after the previous question to close the debate.

Mr. COBURN. Suppose the House should not take a recess to-day, is it understood that this debate shall continue until the recess, and then be resumed afterward?

The SPEAKER. That would be the effect, unless the House should direct otherwise.

Mr. COBURN. I have been informed that very probably the Senate will not adopt our adjournment resolution as passed by us. I have talked with some Senators, who think that the Senate may not agree to an adjournment earlier than Tuesday, in which case the effect of this order might be to give four days to this debate, which I suppose gentlemen of the House do not desire.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. To avoid any trouble of that kind, I will modify my motion so as to provide that the debate prior to the recess shall not occupy more than to-day.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The proposition, then, is that the bill shall be debated to-day and on the first and second days after the recess.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. It is proposed further that the debate shall proceed in twenty-minute speeches, the previous question to be considered as operative on the second day after the recess at four o'clock, which would probably carry the closing hour over until the next morning.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is quite apparent that under this arrangement no business can be transacted to-day. Why may it not be understood by unanimous consent that no other business shall be taken up to-day?

Mr. POTTER. Can we not have a morning hour?

The SPEAKER. This subject can be postponed by a vote of the majority. The gentleman from Massachusetts brought it before the House yesterday afternoon under the right of the committee to report at any time. It comes up this morning as unfinished business, and in that respect crowds out the morning hour, subject, however, to the right of a majority to postpone it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I shall not object to the morning hour.

Mr. POTTER. I move that the pending bill be postponed until after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask that the amendment which I propose be read.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be entered at the Clerk's desk for printing, and will not be voted on until after the recess if opportunity be then given for amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I should like to have the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin read at the Clerk's desk, so we may know what it is.

The SPEAKER. Any amendments which gentlemen may have to propose to this bill can be left at the Clerk's desk, and they will be ordered to be printed in document form as well as in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The following amendments, under the order, were left at the Clerk's desk:

By Mr. ELDREDGE: To the second section add the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to prevent any person or corporation from making any separate arrangement or provision for the accommodation, convenience, or comfort of the white citizens of the United States.

By Mr. BROMBERG: Amend by striking out all after "in charge of," in line 4, as far as the words "any line of stage-coaches," in line 6; also, amend by striking out after the words "or freight," in line 8, to the word "shall," in line 10; also, amend by striking out after the words "because of," in line 12, to the words "shall on conviction," in line 13, and insert in lieu thereof the words "any reason or pretext whatever."

By Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia: Amend, in lines 8 and 9, by striking out the words "or other benevolent institutions."

By Mr. POTTER: Amend by striking out, in the first section, these words in lines 8 and 9: "or of any cemetery, or other benevolent institution, or any public school."

By Mr. WHITEHEAD: Amend in line 9, after the word "institutions," by striking out "or any public school supported in whole or in part at public expense, or by endowment for public use."

PRIVATE-BILL DAY.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at a quarter before one o'clock, and reports of a private nature are in order from the Committee on Elections, this being private-bill day.

JOHN COLTER.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 131) for the relief of John Colter, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that John Colter be relieved from an assessment of $4,414.40, made against him in the fifth revenue district of the State of Indiana, in and for the month of August, in the year 1870, for deficiency of return of distilled spirits, commonly known as deficiency tax; and that any suit or other proceeding now pending against him for the collection thereof be, and the same is hereby, directed to be dismissed or discontinued.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the House this bill was before the Committee on the Judiciary at the last session; that it had the approval of that Committee and was passed by the House, but was not considered in the Senate for want of time.

If any gentleman desires to have an explanation of the matters connected with the bill I will be very glad to give it.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is usual to have a printed report from the committee, considering and reporting such claims, so that members may have an opportunity to examine, at their leisure, all the facts involved. If my colleague, however, has no written report of the facts in this case, I trust he will state them for the information of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I will say that I have here the affidavit of the assessor of internal revenue for that district, and also the affidavit of the assistant assessor, as well as the affidavits of the United States store-keeper and one other official, showing all the facts.

The reason this went to the Committee on the Judiciary is, there was a suit pending, and has been for some time, against Colter for this deficiency tax.

The case in brief was this: He was the owner of a distillery, and by reason of a break in the machinery, it was stopped for three or four days; there was mash left in the tub, and it was necessary for him to look after it so as to provide his hogs with feed. He extracted the spirits from the mash, paid the tax upon it, and then took the mash to feed his stock. In the mean time, however, this four thousand and odd dollars of capacity or deficiency tax ran against him.

I will remark that at the last session of Congress we passed a law providing for this very class of cases, that where there was unavoidable accident, and the party was guilty of no collusion or wrong, this tax should not run against him.

Mr. DAWES. How does this come from the Committee on the Judiciary? Such questions are usually considered by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. It came before the Judiciary Committee because there was a suit pending against this party for the recovery of this tax, and it was, therefore, properly considered by that committee. It was considered by the same committee at the last session, and the bill which was reported passed this House.

Mr. DAWES. The only objection I have is, the danger of having two rules from different committees reported for the guidance of the House. I think such matters should be considered by the Committee on Ways and Means, which has the general charge of all these subjects.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. The only reason it came to the Committee on the Judiciary is the one I have already given.

Mr. POTTER. This bill is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with the consent, I believe, of every member of that committee except myself. I have such a very high regard for the ability and character of my friend from Indiana that I always doubt my own judgment when I differ from him; and I am not very confident I may not be wrong in the belief that this bill ought not to pass.

The circumstances are these, if I understand them correctly: The person for whose relief this bill provides was running a distillery, and liable to be taxed upon its capacity. His machinery happened to break down, and he could not go on for some days. By the law he was taxable upon the capacity of his distillery, whether running or not. He then had on hand a lot of "mash," by the destruction of which, however, he could escape taxation while the distillery was not running. But he has also a lot of hogs; and thinking it a serious thing to destroy the "mash" while he had hogs to feed, he fed his hogs with the "mash." Afterward he took the spirits out.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. He had to take the spirits out before he could feed his hogs. [Laughter.]

Mr. POTTER. Undoubtedly; I should state the process the other way. I am not familiar with the whisky business, as the House will perceive. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. It would seem that hogs decline to take whisky. [Laughter.]

Mr. POTTER. It seems to me that this is one of the cases in which the law intended that the distiller should pay the tax. My learned friend says that we have altered the law. This is one of the cases, then, where a man engaged in the business of distilling becomes liable, under existing laws, to pay a penalty, and comes here to ask us to relieve him because the law has been changed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did not the gentleman say the law has been changed?

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] says that the law has been changed in that regard. But I insist that that is no reason for this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ACCEPTANCE OF A PRESENT.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by Edward Young of a present from the Emperor of Russia.

The joint resolution was read. The preamble recites that His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia has been pleased to confer upon each of the official delegates of the United States to the International Statistical Congress at Saint Petersburg a diamond ring as a souvenir of that reunion; and that one of those delegates, Edward Young, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department, holds an office of profit and trust under the United States; the joint resolution therefore grants the consent of Congress to the said Edward Young to accept from the Emperor of Russia the present above mentioned.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the joint resolution; and being taken, there were ayes 143, noes not counted.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. MYERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF LABORERS.

Mr. BUFFINTON, from the Committee on Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and is hereby, directed to pay from the contingent fund monthly to William Henry Hall, John Douglas, John H. Shaw, William Jones, and George H. Shaw, compensation as laborers for the time they have served and shall serve during the present Congress.

Mr. BUFFINTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

The call of committees having been completed,

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire briefly to explain to the House the thesis on which this bill proceeds. It is perhaps sufficiently explained in the title—"A bill to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights." The bill gives to no man any rights which he has not by law now, unless some hostile State statute has been enacted against him. He has no right by this bill except what every member on this floor and every man in this District has, and every man in New England has, and every man in England has by the common law and the civil law of the country. Let us examine it for a moment. Every man has a right to go into a public inn. Every man has a right to go into any place of public amusement or entertainment for which a license by legal authority is required. He has a right to ride in "any line of stage-coaches, railroad, or other means of public carriage of passengers or freight," and to be buried in any public cemetery; or he has a right in any "other benevolent institutions or any public school supported in whole or in part at public expense or by endowment for public use"—that is, while he behaves himself and pays the requisite cost, charges, and fees, and he has a right of action now against every man who interferes with that right unless there is some state of hostile legislation.

Now, then, we propose simply to give to whoever has this right taken away from him the means of overriding that state of hostile legislation, and of punishing the man who takes that right away from him. This is the whole of that bill. There is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOREY] which I am inclined to accept, or, at least, to permit a vote of the House to be taken upon it; and that is applying the remedies and penalties under those transactions of the civil rights bill of 1866.

Now, then, who shall say that this bill ought not to pass? What is the ground of possible opposition to it? Whether right or wrong; whether for good or ill, the result of the late war has been that every person born on the soil, or duly naturalized, is a citizen of the United States, entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of a citizen. All legislation, therefore, that seeks to deprive a well-behaved citizen of the United States of any privilege or immunity to be enjoyed, and which he is entitled to enjoy in common with other citizens, is against constitutional enactment. But I am not unmindful of the great point to be taken against this bill by its opponents. They will say that it is an invasion of State rights; that the citizens ought to be left to regulate their own domestic affairs in their own way; that that is in accordance with the resolutions of 1798, and that it is in accordance with the well understood doctrines upon which this confederation of States was founded.

I know, I think, as well as I know any other portion of human knowledge, the length, breadth, and extent of State rights, and I am content to uphold them everywhere; but I am not content to uphold State wrongs, and there is the distinction I take. No State has a right to pass any law which inhibits the full enjoyment of all the rights she gives to her citizens by discriminating against any class of them provided they offend no law; and while from my teaching and from my belief I am an old State-rights democrat, yet State rights are one thing and State wrongs are another, and State wrongs must yield to the Constitution of the United States.

Why, sir, if a citizen of the United States, black or white, places his foot on the soil of a foreign country, say England for instance, and is there deprived of his common rights by force, the whole power of the United States, the Army and Navy, can be brought to bear, and ought to be brought to bear, and will be brought to bear to protect him. "I am an American citizen" is now a prouder cry than was "I am a Roman citizen," when it was uttered by the apostle Paul in his defense against unjust imprisonment. A greater power than Rome is behind him with men, money, and political power, and civil and religious liberty, and with the determination to enforce all in his behalf.

Now, shall it be said that it is only on the soil of the United States where a citizen cannot have that power exerted in his behalf? All over the world he is entitled to the protection of that power, except where? Except if a State can inhibit it on the soil of the United States, and under the flag which he or his father or his children have shed their blood to defend and perpetuate as a symbol of the glory, the honor, and the power of his country. I say, sir, that, the Constitution having given equal rights to all men, no State, no man, no power, no potentate on earth has a right to take away or abate one jot or tittle of those rights. Whether it was wise or not to have given these equal rights is a question which no man can answer to-day, because we are trying an entirely new experiment in government. Rome threw her laws all over the world, but kept her citizenship in Latium. She held by force her colonies and gave them her laws, but she held on to the birthright of citizenship, and it was sold only by corrupt emperors at a great price. We are trying the other experiment of a republic. Rome failed; we may fail; but ours is the other and correlative experiment. We take in nations or parts of nations; we take in peoples or parts of peoples wholly diverse from us; and instead of throwing our laws over them and holding them by force, we have always given to them equal rights of citizenship with us and rights of self-government; and not only the right of governing themselves but of assisting in governing us. This great experiment, for the first time tried in the history of the world, has not yet been concluded so that any man can say with certainty that it is the very summit of human wisdom. Certain it is, however, that it is the best emanation of human wisdom yet shown in government, with the best results, and it is going forward as the missionary idea of liberty and equality in the world with the high hopes of every patriot and every well-wisher of his country for its success. It is incumbent upon us to do everything we may that that success shall be achieved, that no prejudice against race or color shall prevail for a moment in any quarter of the country. When a man is a citizen he springs up to the high plane of citizenship; and standing upon that plane he is the equal of every other citizen, whatever may have been his former condition of nationality, race, or color, and he must have all his rights secured to him inviolate. This is the ground on which we present this bill to the House and the country, and we insist that whatever there may have been in State rights in olden times, there is now no right in any State to baffle or abate one jot or tittle any constitutional right of equality in the civil and legal privileges of the meanest citizen of the Republic.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] whether it would not be well to amend the bill by striking out in line 17 of section 1 the words "in an action of debt," and inserting "in any proper action or proceeding, and shall be subject to all authorized remedies or processes."

It is well known that in many of the States where the New York code has been adopted, or a similar code, there is no action of debt; and it may be well to avoid any difficulty on that ground by simply providing that any corporation or person offending as mentioned in the bill shall be liable in any proper action or proceeding. Then the amendment proposes one thing further: that the corporation or person so offending shall be subject to all authorized remedies and processes. Now, there are other remedies besides an action. In some States the corporation or person so offending may be liable to proceeding by mandamus; and I would subject every corporation or person offending against the provisions of this bill to every remedy known to the law. That is the object of the amendment; and I suggest to the gentleman whether it would not be better to make it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This matter has not been unconsidered by the two committees before whom this bill has passed. In the first place, the gentleman from Ohio will observe that all proceedings under this act are to take place, not in the courts of the several States but in the United States courts, and therefore the particular forms in the several States are not obligatory. This being in the nature of a penalty, it would be collected in an action of debt. That is the well-understood and well-defined process in the United States courts, and is obligatory upon them all, and therefore we have given that process. That this is a prosecution for a penalty deprives the party of no common-law remedy which he may have in the State court, whether a mandamus to put him into a stage-coach, or any like process, if he can make it available. This only deals with the penalty. Then we provide for the prosecution of the crime either through the finding of the grand jury or other criminal proceeding known to the United States, or on information by the Attorney-General or the prosecuting attorney.

Mr. LAWRENCE. One word more.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I understand very well that upon common-law principles every party injured would be entitled to the common-law remedies; that the statutory remedies proposed to be given by this bill would be merely cumulative. I understand that very well. But the act of Congress which regulates the courts of the United States authorizes those courts to adopt the practices which prevail in the State courts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But it does not compel them to adopt them.

Mr. LAWRENCE. No, it does not compel them to do so. But suppose they have done so. In the State of Kansas, for instance, the circuit court of the United States has adopted the code of civil procedure in that State, excepting only that defenses in equity cannot, as in the State courts, be made available in the courts of the United States. Now, it does seem to me that in those States where the courts of the United States have adopted the State practice, as they are authorized to do, and thus have adopted a civil action, excluding the action for debt, it would be very well to make the provisions of this bill sufficiently comprehensive to include beyond all doubt every form of remedy known to the law. I will say further that the amendment I have suggested can do no harm, while if the bill is left in its present form there may be some doubt and some uncertainty as to whether it is sufficiently comprehensive.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman can send his amendment to the Clerk's desk and have it printed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Very well; I will do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. BECK obtained the floor.

Mr. BROMBERG. Before the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] proceeds I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] whether any evidence was presented to the Committee on the Judiciary that this law was necessary from the present condition of the South. And was any evidence brought to the attention of the committee to show why the republican party which has held control for years of Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, and Louisiana, and of Texas until this year, has not passed laws covering this ground? And do you come here and ask the party here to pass these laws, because of the lack of protection that the party in power there ought to have given?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In the first place, we hold that it is not the duty of the State Legislatures to protect the interests of citizens of the United States as such, but citizens of the State. In the second place, we have had republican Legislatures in parts of the States, it is true, but the States and their courts have been so largely under the influence of those who have prevented the party from having full control, that such legislation when enacted has not been fully carried out. And more than that, there has been a waiting on the part of the State Legislatures for Congress to give this relief. The republican party in the States believe themselves to be powerless to enforce these rights. For instance, when a railroad-car is in full speed, twenty miles an hour, passing from one State to another, and a negro is taken neck and heels and thrown out of the car, it may be difficult to tell whether that was done on one side or the other of the State line. In one State there may be a law enforcing his rights, and in the other State there may be no such law. Therefore we propose to have a law which will reach the length of the railroad, unless it runs across the Pacific Ocean. That is why the States have not passed such laws as are needed.

Now, as to whether there has been any call for such a law as this, I say, yes, sir. Over and over again there came before the committee men who were summoned as witnesses, who, having paid first-class fare on railroads—higher fare than is paid on any other railroads in the world—were thrown out of the cars unless they would go into a dirty, dusty, miserable smoking-car, or some other car that no gentleman would want to go into; and yet they were gentlemen in every regard.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Allow me to state a case showing the necessity for this bill. William Smith, a colored citizen, a most estimable gentleman, who has charge of the library of this House, while traveling within the last year with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER,] was expelled from a railroad-car in one of the Southern States for no reason except his color, and he has been unable as yet to get any redress. This bill is designed to give him, and all others who may be similarly treated, a remedy for the wrongs practiced upon them. Mr. Smith was expelled, as I understand, against the wishes and earnest protest of the gentleman with whom he was traveling, and whose friend he was, and there ought to be a remedy for such outrages. For one, I am ready to exert the whole power given by the Constitution to secure all citizens in the enjoyment of their civil rights. It is a duty we owe to them, to the Government under which we live, to humanity, and to justice.

Mr. BROMBERG. Allow me to make one correction of the remarks just made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] It is not true that the republican party has not had power in the States referred to. In Alabama they have had control from 1868 down to this time; with thirty-two out of thirty-three members of the Senate, and eighty-odd out of ninety members of the House, and all the officers in the State, down to the lowest justice of the peace.

Mr. BECK. I cannot yield further for debate.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to offer the following amendment:

Add to section 1 the following: Provided, That the penalties of this act shall not be limited to persons of the white race, but that colored or black men who may be be in charge of any places of amusement or entertainment, or any other persons hereby affected by this act, who shall discriminate against their white brethren, shall also be held liable to the penalties of this act.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Allow me to say that they are included now, because the bill provides for every natural person, and the negro is a very natural person.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in the beginning, by way of apology to the House, that I did not expect to debate this bill to-day. I have not prepared myself to do so. I am not a member of the committee that reported it, and never saw the bill till this morning, nor have I looked carefully into the authorities bearing on the question. When I urged this morning what seemed to me a reasonable latitude of debate, I spoke in behalf of other gentlemen, one of whom—the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS]—told me that he was too unwell to speak to-day. Another gentleman on this side, my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] is also too unwell to speak. I expected, of course, that the gentlemen on the committee who object to the passage of this bill would debate it to-day, and enlighten the House upon it; but they prefer to participate in the discussion at a later stage. As no one else seems ready to speak just now, I take the floor to lay before the House a few general ideas I entertain on the subject, which I think I can state in the twenty minutes allowed me; of course, the legal and political questions involved cannot be argued in detail under a twenty minutes limit.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that any man on this side of the House opposes this bill because he wants the negro race oppressed, because he desires to see them deprived of education or of any other right guaranteed to them by the Constitution and laws. But many of us do object, and I for one, to the usurpation by Congress of authority over matters that belong exclusively to the States, prescribing severe penalties to be enforced by the courts of the United States; to enforce laws which are violative, as I believe, of the rights of the States and the people thereof. We are approaching consolidation fast enough. We are drifting into centralism step by step so rapidly and steadily that it will not be many years before the States will occupy the same relation to the General Government that the counties bear to the States. Ten years ago that suggestion met with ridicule only from men of all parties.

I object further to this bill, because this coercive legislation, which seeks to put the colored population of the States of the South into the common schools with the white children, will not only be no advantage to them, but will be a positive injury, and will only be available when men who are seeking to drive party politics at the point of the bayonet will make disturbances there, and will seek to enforce martial law because the behests of Congress are not obeyed, and thus carry the elections at the point of the bayonet for the man they want to elect against the popular will.

Mr. RANSIER. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. BECK. Not a word now. The gentleman may have his own time.

I object to this bill because the Constitution of the United States and all its amendments are violated by its provisions. This question has been carefully examined by the Supreme Court of the United States; and that tribunal, as I read the decision, has decided in the late case from New Orleans, that these rights pertaining to the rights of corporations, and inferentially to common schools, are not embraced in the powers confided to Congress by the constitutional amendments. Under the authority to enforce the amendments by appropriate legislation, these are not rights guaranteed by them, or rights about which Congress has authority to legislate.

Massachusetts, to-day, does not allow a man to vote in the State unless he can read the constitution in the English language and write his name. If the people of Kentucky, in the exercise of their constitutional authority, should do as Massachusetts has done—should amend their constitution by incorporating such a prohibition—not one negro in a hundred in the State of Kentucky could go to the polls and vote. We have not done so; we have not thought of doing it, because we have endeavored, in good faith, to give those negroes, ignorant as they are, the rights conferred upon them by the fifteenth amendment. Under such a provision ninety-nine out of every hundred of the negroes, who were slaves in my State seven years ago, would be excluded from the polls. We could, if we saw fit, prescribe other qualifications for the exercise of suffrage or the qualification for office.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman allow me to put in a word here about Massachusetts?

Mr. BECK. I do not object; I suppose it is the right of Massachusetts to be heard.

Mr. DAWES. Let me say, in all candor and kindness, that the great difference between Massachusetts and Kentucky, in the very matter to which the gentleman calls attention, is that for a hundred years or more Massachusetts has been educating every one of her people, without regard to color.

Mr. BECK. Yes; that may be. But the gentleman will recollect that we had slaves in my State till the close of the war.

Mr. DAWES. That is the difference.

Mr. BECK. Yes; that was the difference. I am not complaining of the exercise by Massachusetts of her authority under her own constitution. I simply mention the fact to show that Massachusetts exercises a power which would exclude from suffrage ninety-nine out of every hundred of the negroes in my State, or of any State of the South, going to Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman will remember that we in Massachusetts had once the misfortune to have slaves.

Mr. BECK. That was a long time ago. But I am not desiring to deprive the State of Massachusetts of any rights; I am insisting that in passing laws here we ought to take care that they do not infringe the rights of the States. Massachusetts had the right to put that provision in her constitution to protect her people from the votes of the negroes of the South, if they should be so unfortunate as to go there. I am stating a fact, not complaining of it.

The Supreme Court of the United States, as I before remarked, very recently considered these questions in the slaughter-house cases, it carefully examined the bearings of the constitutional amendments on this subject. The fourteenth amendment, as is well known, did not allow to colored men the right to vote, and that was controlled by State laws, notwithstanding all the rights conferred by former amendments, and therefore it was necessary to pass the fifteenth amendment. The fourteenth amendment provides as follows:

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Now, what does the court say in commenting upon that amendment?

Let me read a few paragraphs from the opinion:

The next observation is more important in view of the arguments of counsel in the present case. It is that the distinction between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a State is clearly recognized and established. Not only may a man be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of a State, but an important element is necessary to convert the former into the latter. He must reside within the State to make him a citizen of it, but it is only necessary that he should be born or naturalized in the United States to be a citizen of the Union.

It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.

We think this distinction and its explicit recognition in this amendment of great weight in this argument, because the next paragraph of this same section, which is the one mainly relied on by the plaintiffs in error, speaks only of privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and does not speak of those of citzens of the several States. The argument, however, in favor of the plaintiffs rests wholly on the assumption that the citizenship is the same, and the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the clause are the same.

The language is: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as a protection to the citizen of a State against the legislative power of his own State, that the term "citizen of the State" should be left out when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to "citizens of the United States," in the very sentence which precedes it. It is too clear for argument that the change in phraseology was adopted understandingly and with a purpose.

Of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the State, and what they respectively are we will presently consider; but we wish to state here that it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment. If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such, and those belonging to the citizen of the State as such, the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested, for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment. * * * * * But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal Governments to each other and of both these governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

There are many other paragraphs in the opinion equally strong, which I have not time to read or even to notice. I hope the case will be carefully examined by a gentleman who will have an opportunity to debate this proposition after the recess. The whole spirit and bearing of the decision is against the constitutionality of the law now proposed, matters of regulation as to education, local corporations, and their rights and privileges being subjects which bear only on the individual as a citizen of the State, and not as a citizen of the United States.

As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has well said, a citizen of the United States has a right to go upon the high seas; he has a right to go all over the world. The flag of the nation protects him. The first ten amendments to the Constitution of the United States go far beyond his claim, as he states it, in asserting what the rights of citizens of the United States shall be; and it is there declared that no State shall deprive them of any of those rights. They are laid down explicitly, and I will quote them at length:

ARTICLE I. Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or of the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

ARTICLE II. A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

ARTICLE III. No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner; nor in time of war but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

ARTICLE IV. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

ARTICLE V. No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

ARTICLE VI. In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

ARTICLE VII. In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

ARTICLE VIII. Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

ARTICLE IX. The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

ARTICLE X. The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

The last article read ought not to be overlooked.

These are the rights of a citizen of the United States which the fourteenth amendment declares no State shall abridge. The Supreme Court recognizes them, and goes on to enumerate a few others of the same general character in the case I have quoted from. They are now secured to white and black alike; they were not, under the Dred Scott decision, till the fourteenth amendment became part of the Constitution. But it is now proposed to legislate in Congress as to matters such as the regulation of corporations, inns, endowed seminaries of learning, and how school funds shall be distributed, and to compel all children, white or black, to attend school together. That is a matter for State legislation, and Congress has no right to interfere with it. Surely, sir, the people could establish schools in any of the States which none but white females should attend or that none but white males should attend, and might do the same for colored males and females. That would not at all interfere with the colored population having their proportion of the taxes collected to be expended in the education of colored children. We in Kentucky have a right, I say, to arrange separate schools for them, wherein they will get their equal rights. I suppose no man will contend that in any school in my State, established expressly for the education of females, any male negro shall have the right to force himself there where no white male can go. The principle may be extended even that far hereafter if Congress enters upon this character of legislation. The effect of trying to force the colored children among the whites will not be of any benefit to the negro, but, on the contrary, will be of positive injury. Men make a mistake when they think coercion is the appropriate and legitimate province of legislation. Something is due even to the prejudices of men; something is due to the views which State Legislatures may entertain; and whenever Congress undertakes to take control of the States and to deprive them of power, either from spite or any other cause, it is acting unwisely; because it tends to destroy whatever is valuable in the common-school system by making people loathe and despise instead of love and cherish it.

Our legislation will not affect gentlemen in this hall. It does not affect me. I can send my children where I please to have them educated. When you undertake, by your legislation here, to force white and black, male and female, into the same school, the men who have wealth will not send their children; but the poor man will be compelled to send his or let them grow up in ignorance and vice, which will be the alternative chosen in most instances. You will force, in all the States where there is a large colored population, all the skilled industry of other parts of the world away from us, because men who are poor and desire to come among us will not, when they see their richer white neighbors sending their children to private schools or to other States, where they can send their children nowhere but to be with the colored children. You will destroy the public schools altogether, and will not benefit the colored people by doing it. If there was no question as to your power—if the Constitution of the United States gave to you the authority—it would be impolitic and unwise to force it to that extent. It is this question in regard to schools that I look at with the most serious apprehension, though the other provisions of the bill are equally vicious in principle. Does any gentleman upon this floor think that any intelligent man representing a Southern State wants to keep the colored people of the South in ignorance? If he does he is grievously mistaken.

No, sir; if he had no higher motive than his own interest, he would endeavor by every means in his power to improve them mentally and morally; and the States are rapidly developing means to do so, as rapidly as can be expected. They are straining every nerve to furnish them the means of education, to make them industrious, to make them honest, to make them understand the great duties imposed on them by the amendments to the Constitution in their altered condition. No matter what may have been his views of the policy of those changes, now that they are the fundamental law, no man desires to restore the former state of things. Every man is desirous of seeing that the interests of the colored people are promoted; that their intelligence shall be increased; and that all the elements which will make them more virtuous citizens than they were shall be given them in abundance. And if Congress will let the States alone, if it will hold its hand and not put them under coercion, I venture to say that, step by step, every State will do all that any man on this floor can want to have done. But there is many a man that can be led that will not be driven; and if you determine now, when there is no crying evil, to take hold of these States and their institutions by Federal authority, to exert your power to deprive their Legislatures of the right to pass such laws as they may think judicious, that moment the States will cease to act. They will say, "Let Congress do it," and then whatever rights the colored people may get they will get grudgingly and sulkily, and they will be of no value to them when given. But when they come cheerfully from the Legislatures of their own States, as they do come and are coming, then they are valuable rights.

My own State for a long time objected to allowing colored men to testify in cases where white men were parties. Congress threatened to pass a law to enforce this, and the Legislature folded its arms and would not move. Congress withdrew its threatened action, and then the Legislature promptly and almost unanimously passed the law; and to-day, in all the courts of the State, the colored men are testifying, having an equal right in the courts with white men, and there is not a man in the State who would deprive them of it. But if you had forced it upon them by your legislation, another and very different state of things would have existed. We ought to know that whenever a thing can be accomplished with the cordial assent of the people among whom it has to operate, then it will operate well; when it is forced upon them, then it will operate badly.

Why, sir, if Congress takes this step, it is the entering wedge to take absolute control over education everywhere. Your courts will have to watch the States, and will have to punish the wrongs done, and the colored people will be driven on and on as demagogues arise wanting their votes, and they will be brought here to hold conventions and make demands of Congress, until there is no telling where the strife will end.

I suppose there are gentlemen on this floor who would arrest, imprison, and fine a young woman in any State of the South if she were to refuse to marry a negro man on account of color, race, or previous condition of servitude, in the event of his making her a proposal of marriage, and her refusing on that ground. That would be depriving him of a right he had under the amendment, and Congress would be asked to take it up, and say, "This insolent white woman must be taught to know that it is a misdemeanor to deny a man marriage because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude;" and Congress will be urged to say after a while that that sort of thing must be put a stop to, and your conventions of colored men will come here asking you to enforce that right.

I made a few notes while listening to the debate this morning, but I find, as my time is within a minute of expiring, that I will not be able to answer much of what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has said as I would like to do. I will say, however, that I see one evil purpose in all this legislation. Many of the gentlemen on this floor perhaps do not see it; but the purpose is, I fear, by this Federal legislation, to impose laws so obnoxious on the States in which there are large numbers of colored persons that they will, whenever the proper occasion arises, be goaded on to demand their rights in the most offensive form. It will happen, of course, that in some localities those offensive demands will be resisted or grudgingly given. Arrests will be made; imprisonments will follow; fines will be inflicted; the cry will be raised that these men are disloyal and not in obedience to the Constitution of the United States; the Army and Navy will be called into requisition upon statements made by spies and informers in the pay of the Executive Departments. All this will be brought about whenever party electioneering interests demand it; the people will be put under the ban, and their ballot-boxes closed, or they driven away or put into jails, because of some pretended offenses that have been committed under these laws; elections will be a farce, as they are in too many places now. While, perhaps, no gentleman on this floor intends that, my word for it, that is the meaning, the intent, the purpose, and the object of driving this legislation through now, and under these circumstances time will prove the truth of what I say. Of course, it will be denied now.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to participate in this debate at this early period; and I would have preferred to wait until I should have had a full exposition of the opinions entertained by the other side of the House. I know, sir, that gentlemen on the other side have professed a great deal of friendship for the race to which I belong; and in the last presidential election they pledged themselves that they would accord to the negroes of this country all the rights that were given to other citizens. I am somewhat surprised to perceive that on this occasion, when the demand is made upon Congress by the people to guarantee those rights to a race heretofore oppressed, we should find gentlemen on the other side taking another view of the case from that which they professed in the past. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has taken a legal view of this question, and he is undoubtedly capable of taking that view. I am not a lawyer, and consequently I cannot take a legal view of this matter, or perhaps I cannot view it through the same optics that he does. I view it in the light of the Constitution—in the light of the amendments that have been made to that Constitution; I view it in the light of humanity; I view it in the light of the progress and civilization which are now rapidly marching over this country. We, sirs, would not ask of this Congress as a people that they should legislate for us specifically as a class if we could only have those rights which this bill is designed to give us accorded us without this enactment. I can very well understand the opposition to this measure by gentlemen on the other side of the House, and especially of those who come from the South. They have a feeling against the negro in this country that I suppose will never die out. They have an antipathy against that race of people, because of their loyalty to this Government, and because at the very time when they were needed to show their manhood and valor they came forward in defense of the flag of the country and assisted in crushing out the rebellion. They, sir, would not give to the colored man the right to vote or the right to enjoy any of those immunities which are enjoyed by other citizens, if it had a tendency to make him feel his manhood and elevate him above the ordinary way of life. So long as he makes himself content with ordinary gifts, why it is all well; but when he aspires to be a man, when he seeks to have the rights accorded him that other citizens of the country enjoy, then he is asking too much, and such gentlemen as the gentleman from Kentucky are not willing to grant it.

The gentleman from Kentucky says that the Constitution has prescribed what rights we ought to have and to enjoy. I ask the gentleman, in the light of the Constitution, if he can say to the House to-day conscientiously, if he can say to the country conscientiously, that the rights which are guaranteed by the Constitution are given to the negroes in the State of Kentucky? I should like to know if they enjoy those immunities and those rights there. Why, I saw not long since a measure pending—and it was pending during the last Congress—to deprive the negroes of Kentucky of the right of suffrage. They do not want any enactment by Congress that will have a tendency to elevate the negro and make him feel that he is a man and an American citizen. Just so long as you will let Kentucky and the other Southern States, and some of the Northern and Western States, mete out to us what they think we ought to have, and we receive it without objection, we are good, clever fellows; but just as soon as we begin to assert our manhood and demand our rights we are looked upon as men not worthy to be recognized, we become objectionable, we become obnoxious, and we hear this howl about social equality.

Now, gentlemen, let me say the negro is not asking social equality. We do not ask it of you, we do not ask of the gentleman from Kentucky that the two races should intermarry one with the other. God knows we are perfectly content. I can say for myself that I am contented to be what I am so long as I have my rights; I am contented to marry one of my own complexion, and do not seek intercourse with any other race, because I believe that the race of people I represent, to the extent of the opportunities which they have had, and considering how recently they have escaped from the oppression and wrongs committed upon them, are just as virtuous and hold just as many high characteristics as any class in the country. I think the statistics will prove that there is as much virtue among the negroes as among the whites. Sir, we are not seeking to be put on a footing of social equality. I prefer to choose my own associates, and all my colleagues here and the whole race I belong to prefer to make that choice. We do not ask the passage of any law forcing us upon anybody who does not want to receive us. But we do want a law enacted that we may be recognized like other men in the country. Why is it that colored members of Congress cannot enjoy the same immunities that are accorded to white members? Why cannot we stop at hotels here without meeting objection? Why cannot we go into restaurants without being insulted? We are here enacting laws for the country and casting votes upon important questions; we have been sent here by the suffrages of the people, and why cannot we enjoy the same benefits that are accorded to our white colleagues on this floor?

I say to you, gentlemen, that this discrimination against the negro race in this country is unjust, is unworthy of a high-minded people whose example should have a salutary influence in the world. I am very much surprised at the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] making these objections and urging them upon this House. I had supposed that, having had an opportunity during the past summer to return to the land that gave him birth, and to breathe the free atmosphere among the hills of Old Scotland, he would return to the land of his adoption with a generous spirit and open heart, ready to accord to the negro in this country the rights that belong to him as a citizen. But, returning as he does to the soil of America, he comes back with the same deep-rooted prejudice against the race to which I belong, and stands up here to-day and declares that if we be permitted to enter free schools or the public institutions in this country it can only be by the power of the bayonet, because it would create insurrection and rebellion in the Southern States.

Sir, why does it not create insurrection and rebellion in the East? Why not in Ohio and in other parts of the country where these rights are now accorded to us? We have a great many, but not all, of our rights in South Carolina, and there is no rebellion there. In the Legislature of South Carolina I find democrats voting for the civil-rights bill. It is upon this floor that I find men who talk about the South being oppressed, rather than those who have an opportunity at home to give an expression to their opinion.

I say to you, gentlemen, that you are making a mistake. Public opinion is aroused on this question. I tell you that the negro will never rest until he gets his rights. We ask them because we know it is proper, not because we want to deprive any other class of the rights and immunities they enjoy, but because they are granted to us by the law of the land. Why this discrimination against us when we enter public conveyances or places of public amusement? Why is a discrimination made against us in the churches; and why in the cemeteries when we go to pay that last debt of nature that brings us all upon a level?

Gentlemen, I say to you this discrimination must cease. We are determined to fight this question; we believe the Constitution gives us this right. All of the fifteen amendments made to the Constitution run down in one single line of protecting the rights of the citizens of this country. One after another of those amendments give these rights to citizens; step by step these rights are secured to them. And now we say to you that if you will not obey the Constitution, then the power is given by that Constitution for the enactment of such a law as will have a tendency to enforce the provisions thereof.

Mr. Speaker, I will reserve much that I have to say upon this question for another time. I feel grateful to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] for having accorded to me so much of his time and to the House for its indulgence.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If nobody desires to debate this question at this time I will move that the House now adjourn until Tuesday next.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under a business engagement which he does not know how to free himself from, and which will require his absence from the House on Monday next. With the leave of the House he will name Hon. WILLIAM A. WHEELER, a Representative from the State of New York, to act as Speaker pro tempore during the absence of the Speaker.

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

APPOINTMENTS ON COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MYERS, appointed chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. PACKARD, a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, desire to exchange places. It is not within the power of the Speaker to make any such order, but by unanimous consent of the House the exchange may be made. If there is no objection it will be made.

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR SATURDAY AND MONDAY.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have been asked to submit to the House whether to-morrow may not be set apart for general debate, no business to be transacted. If that is satisfactory to the House, I am willing to withdraw my motion to adjourn until Tuesday and let that order be made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been advised that several gentlemen desire to speak on the annual message of the President of the United States as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection to assigning to-morrow for debate only?

Mr. HEREFORD. I would suggest that Monday also be set apart for debate only.

Mr. DAWES. I trust that we will have a recess provided for before Monday.

Mr. HEREFORD. I think not, from the information I have. But if so, there will be no harm done.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I would suggest this modification to the order, that if the Senate shall act upon the question of a recess, the House will retain the control of that question to-morrow and Monday.

Mr. DAWES. If the resolution of the House providing for a recess during the holidays shall come back from the Senate with an amendment requiring some action on the part of the House, that business should be excepted from the order.

The SPEAKER. That can be done.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will include that in my motion.

Mr. POTTER. If in the mean time the Senate shall send back a resolution upon the subject of the recess that would be acceptable to the House, the House could act upon it, and then the recess would ensue.

The SPEAKER. That is so.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If there should be no quorum here, as undoubtedly would be the case if nothing is to be done except debate, there can be no action upon the resolution from the Senate.

The SPEAKER. If no gentleman calls for any action to develop the fact that there is no quorum present, it would not affect the question.

Mr. DAWES. If no record is made showing the absence of a quorum it would be all right.

The SPEAKER. Unless attention be called to the question whether a quorum be present, one member can do business as well as two hundred.

Mr. KELLEY. Are there not bills pending before the Senate that may come back to us with amendments? I understand there is a possibility, perhaps a probability, that the Senate will consent to an adjournment from next Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. That was the understanding.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If bills be passed, the President will not be here to sign them during the next few days; so it can make no difference.

Mr. DAWES. It is evident that the House will be so thin after to-day that no one would desire formal action upon any important bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let it be understood that nothing shall be considered except the recess.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is that on to-morrow and Monday the House shall meet for debate only, except that it may act upon any proposition relative to the holiday recess. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

PUBLIC LANDS IN NEVADA.

Mr. KENDALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R No. 827) in relation to public lands in the State of Nevada; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

G. ALFRED HALL.

Mr. SHELDON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 828) for the relief of G. Alfred Hall; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ADJUSTMENT OF PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. SHELDON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 829) further to extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the final adjustment of private land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

GERMAN LUTHERAN CHURCH, SHEBOYGAN.

Mr. ELDREDGE, by unanimous consent, presented a petition of the German Lutheran Church of Sheboygan, Wisconsin, for the refunding of duties paid on cannon donated by the Emperor of Germany for a bell for said church; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS TORRE.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 830) for the relief of Thomas Torre: which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS ON OSAGE CEDED LANDS.

Mr. PHILLIPS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 831) for the relief of the settlers on the Osage ceded lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SELF-ADJUSTING CURRENCY.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 832) to make the volume of the currency self-adjusting according to the wants of the people; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

IRREDEEMABLE CURRENCY OF CORPORATIONS.

Mr. ELLIOTT, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of J. W. Parker, vice-president of the Carolina National Bank; C. J. Iredell, Edwin I. Scott & Son, bankers; W. B. Stanley, merchant; and other bankers and merchants of the city of Columbia, South Carolina, praying Congress to prohibit by law the issuance of an irredeemable currency by certain corporations, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. AVERILL. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Indian Affairs be enlarged by the addition of one member.

The SPEAKER. This proposition really refers to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] who was chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs during the last Congress, but who, by reason of his not having taken his seat when the committees were appointed, could not be recognized in their organization. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AVERILL] therefore asks that the Chair may be authorized to appoint an additional member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. Is there objection? [A pause.] The Chair hears none, and names as the additional member of the committee Hon. JOHN P. C. SHANKS, of Indiana.

GEORGE H. MELLAN.

Mr. HYNES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 833) granting a pension to George H. Mellan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT OF FIVE-TWENTY BONDS.

Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

Whereas it appears from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury that there has been paid to holders of bonds of the United States the sum of $39,758,532.71 premium in the purchase of bonds of the face value of $323,253,800; and whereas the principal of said bonds for which said premium has been paid, by the express provisions of the law under which said bonds were issued, was payable in lawful money and not in gold: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that all future payments of the principal of the bonds known as five-twenties be paid in lawful money, commonly called legal-tender notes; and also providing that the holders of said bonds may sue the United States in any circuit court of the United States for the principal of said bonds in gold, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court to either party; and that the judgment of said court shall be final and conclusive as to the right of said bondholders to demand gold in payment of the principal of said bonds; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BEAUFORT, SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. RANSIER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 834) authorizing the purchase or erection of a suitable building at Beaufort, South Carolina, for Government offices; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

CITADEL ACADEMY, SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. RANSIER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 835) authorizing the rebuilding of the west wing of the building in the city of Charleston, South Carolina, occupied by the United States, and known as the Citadel Academy, and making appropriation for the same; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

GRAPE BRANDY.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 836) to remove all internal-revenue tax from grape brandy manufactured in the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SUBSIDIES TO RAILROADS.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the several railroad companies hereinafter named have received from the United States by authority of the act of Congress of July 1, 1862, and the several acts amendatory thereof, money subsidies to aid in the construction of their several roads, as follows: to the Central Pacific, $25,885,120; to the Kansas Pacific, $6,303,000; to the Union Pacific, $27,236,512; to the Central Branch Union Pacific, $1,600,000; to the Western Pacific, $1,970,560; and to the Sioux City and Pacific, $1,628,320—making a grand total of $64,623,512; and the said several railroad companies have agreed to pay back said advances, together with the interest due thereon, the United States holding a second mortgage upon said roads to secure the repayment and interest; and whereas the said railroad companies have heretofore refused and omitted, and still do refuse, to pay to the United States their proportions of interest heretofore accruing, or any portion thereof; and whereas the United States has paid or advanced the sum of $20,447,986.25 interest for said several railroad companies, and there remains yet unpaid interest to the amount of $1,292,470.20: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Judiciary Committee is hereby instructed to report a bill authorizing and requiring the Attorney-General of the United States to institute and prosecute the requisite legal proceedings to enforce the immediate payment of such accrued and accruing interest.

Mr. MAYNARD. What action does the gentleman propose on that preamble and resolution?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I desire that they shall be acted on at this time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to action at this time, does the gentleman wish the preamble and resolution referred?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Let it be referred and ordered to be printed.

The preamble and resolution were referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. PACKARD. I ask unanimous consent to submit and have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some remarks which I have prepared on the subject of the salary bill. [See Appendix.]

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

THE REFUNDING OF TAXES.

Mr. CHIPMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 837) to refund taxes improperly collected; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN FINK.

Mr. LOWNDES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 838) granting a pension to John Fink; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CITIZENS' NATIONAL BANK, HAGERSTOWN, MARYLAND.

Mr. LOWNDES also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 839) authorizing the Citizens' National Bank, of Hagerstown, Maryland, to change its location; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY TELEGRAPH OPERATORS.

Mr. LOWNDES also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H

R. No. 840) to include military telegraphic operators within the provisions of an act approved April 4, 1872, to enable honorably discharged soldiers, &c., to acquire homesteads on the public lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TELEGRAPH LINES BETWEEN THE CAPITOL AND DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. TYNER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 89) in relation to lines of telegraphs connecting the Capitol with the various Departments of the Government, that it may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. Not to be brought upon a motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is that an appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know what it contains.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object, if the committee is to have authority to report back at any time.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The committee has no authority to report at any time on such a matter as this.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the committee will not report anything which has not the authority of law.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The committee will scrutinize the bill very carefully.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill remains on the Speaker's table.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. HOLMAN said: I did not object to the telegraph bill going to the Committee on Appropriations, if they are not entitled to report it back at any time.

The SPEAKER. It would not be a privileged report. The Chair will state for the information of the House that the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations can only report at any time appropriation bills and tax bills, and those only for reference to the Committee of the Whole. That is the full extent of the privilege.

Mr. HOLMAN. What I wish is, that the committee shall look carefully into this bill, so that no money shall be expended without the authority of law.

There being no further objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

NAVY-YARD AT PORT ROYAL, SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. CAIN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 841) to establish a navy-yard at Port Royal, South Carolina; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING THE DEBATES.

Mr. DONNAN. I rise to report back from the Committee on Printing, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 718) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873.

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the point of order on the bill until I hear it read.

The bill was read. It proposes to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873, by adding to the proviso in the clause of said act relating to the public printing and binding the following words: "and of the House of Representatives."

Mr. DONNAN. I desire to state to the House what is the occasion for this bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is this a privileged report? I wish to know if the committee have the right to report at any time an amendment to an appropriation act?

Mr. DONNAN. The bill has reference solely to the question of printing. I ask the House to hear me for one moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether the committee is entitled to make this as a privileged report. Privileged reports of the Committee on Printing are those which relate to the printing of documents, not those which relate to general provisions of law.

Mr. DONNAN. I ask consent to be heard in explanation of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. As I have stated, I reserve points of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the gentleman makes his statement let us understand what the bill is.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again read it.

The bill was again read.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to hear the clause of the original act read in connection with this bill.

Mr. DONNAN. I can explain it in a moment. At the close of the second session of the Forty-second Congress it was enacted that no more debates of Congress should be printed at the public expense until a contract was entered into for the purpose. At the last session of Congress that proviso was repealed, and the following was enacted in its stead:

Provided, That until a contract is made the debates shall be printed by the Congressional Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing on the part of the Senate.

The proposition is now simply to add the words "and of the House of Representatives." As the matter now stands the House has no voice whatever in relation to the printing by the Public Printer of the debates of Congress. The matter is entirely in the hands of the Joint Committee on Public Printing on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MAYNARD. That was what was intended.

Mr. DAWES. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing whether the committee have made any such investigation of the present cost of printing the debates as to enable him to say whether we are saving or losing under the existing arrangement?

Mr. DONNAN. Not as yet. That question is before the committee and will be answered in due time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I feel obliged to object to this.

Mr. DAWES. Why should the gentleman from Tennessee want that this authority should be taken away from us? The object of this bill is simply to provide that the printing of the debates shall be under the joint authority of the two Houses.

Mr. MAYNARD. The law was made in view of the extra session of the Senate. They have already acted, and I do not think we should interfere.

Mr. DAWES. From time to time, whenever there was any trouble, we have been in the habit of taking away authority from ourselves and putting it in the hands of the Senate. We made the Public Printer elective by the Senate. We have made several other officers from time to time elective by the Senate. We have been putting power into their hands which they will never give up except by act of Congress. In this instance, last spring, when there was no motive or reason for it in the world that I can think of, we put the whole printing of our debates, as well as theirs, solely under the control of the Senate. This proposition is that it may be under the joint control of the two Houses.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right.

Mr. DAWES. I do not see why in the world the gentleman from Tennessee should object to so reasonable a proposition as this.

Mr. HOLMAN. This proposition is certainly right.

Mr. DONNAN. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his objection.

Mr. MAYNARD. I cannot withdraw it at present.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. MAYNARD said: I have examined the bill in relation to printing, and I have concluded that the objection to its passage at this time should not be insisted upon, and therefore I withdraw it.

No further objection being made the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. COTTON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Railways and Canals be instructed to inquire whether the rates charged by the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company for the transportation of cars, freight, and passengers across the bridges and tracks connecting Davenport, in the State of Iowa, and Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, are reasonable; and, if not, what measures may be necessary to secure reasonable rates.

PRINTING OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. WADDELL, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the following resolution; and the same was laid upon the table:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the expediency of printing the Journal of the House, and executive and legislative documents, in the same style and size as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

HENRY HOOVER.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to review the finding of the court-martial in relation to Henry Hoover, late naval constructor in the United States Navy, and the action of the Navy Department thereon, and to take such action in reference to said Hoover as the justice of the case and the provisions of existing law may require.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BOSTON POST-OFFICE.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I send up a resolution to be read, and then I ask consent to say a few words in explanation of it.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be authorized to send a subcommittee of not more than three to Boston, Massachusetts, to examine the land for the site of the post-office extension there, and take testimony as to its value and the possibility of adjusting the controversy about that property.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the right to object to that resolution.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Congress last year appropriated $500,000 to extend the post-office or to buy land to extend the post-office at Boston, after the district was burned over. That was then thought to be a proper sum, and I think so still. The Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to take the land under State laws. He proceeded to do so, and the matter went to jury, and owing, I think it must have been, to certain rulings of the court, the jury brought in a verdict which, if it went through the whole site of the building, would make the site alone cost a million dollars. And, under the law as it stands, I do not know but a claim may be brought against the United States for that amount. That controversy is still going on, and the land cannot be occupied either by the claimants or by the United States. I do not think the United States ought to pay a million dollars for it, and I will not vote that sum if the post-office is never extended. I want, therefore, the small amount expended necessary to allow two or three members of the Committee on Appropriations, of which I am not a member, to go down there and take testimony as to the value of the land, during the vacation, or at their convenience, and, having taken that testimony, I have no doubt the controversy may be adjusted, or, if it cannot be, the House will be in a position to act understandingly, and I think they may save half a million of dollars to the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask whether any of this land has been condemned under the State law?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The whole thing has been done under the State law.

Mr. HOLMAN. The additional land has never been taken in charge by the Government.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, no; of course not; neither party gets the benefit of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we can get along without the additional land at all, and I shall therefore have to object to the resolution. I think the Committee on Appropriations should see if we cannot save the $500,000 appropriated last year by the Government.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Nobody here on the floor is more desirous of cutting down the expenditures on public buildings than are the Committee on Appropriations. I know it to be the determined purpose on the part of the members of that committee to meet that question, and cut down the expenditures as far as possible. But here is an embarrassing question about the Boston post-office, and I am by no means certain, although I never heard of this proposition until the resolution was read, but what it would help the Committee on Appropriations, in the direction that it is seeking to run, to investigate this subject. There is some doubt whether or not we cannot get along without the extra sum.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The question is whether the half million cannot be saved.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That question is also involved in the investigation. I think the investigation proposed might aid the committee in this direction.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the present condition of the public Treasury, I shall have to object to the resolution.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. HOLMAN said: The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] and other gentlemen connected with that committee insist that the public interest will be promoted by the appointment of this sub-committee. Therefore, contrary to my judgment, I will withdraw my objection.

No further objection being made, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COPIES OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORD FOR ITS COMPOSITORS.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the expediency of furnishing one copy of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the cases of the compositors on said RECORD.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, Mr. WOODFORD, asks to be relieved from service upon the Committee on War Claims. Under the rules he has strictly the right to decline this service, because he is assigned to three committees—one special and two standing committees. He will be excused, and his colleague, Mr. MELLISH, appointed in his place.

DEFAULTING REVENUE COLLECTORS.

Mr. RAWLS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for adoption at this time:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill to this House, at as early a day as may be practicable, if possible to better secure the Government against losses by defaulting revenue collectors.

Mr. DAWES. That should be made a resolution to inquire into the expediency, &c., and addressed to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. RAWLS. I am willing to have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I simply wish to call attention to the subject.

Mr. DAWES. Let it go to the Committee on Ways and Means; that committee is now considering that very subject.

Mr. RAWLS. Very well; let it go there.

The resolution was referred accordingly.

EMPLOYÉS OF THE INTERNAL REVENUE BUREAU.

Mr. COX. I ask consent to submit the following resolution for adoption at this time:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, requested to inform this House what number of persons were employed in the Internal Revenue Bureau December 1, 1866, and what compensation was paid them; and what number of persons were employed in said Bureau on the 1st of December, 1873, and what compensation was paid them.

Mr. DAWES. I do not object to the reference of that resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no harm in it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be adopted; let us have the information.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw my objection.

The resolution was adopted.

NEW ORLEANS PRIZE-MONEY.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I submit the following resolution for adoption at this time:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House, if in accordance with the interests of the Government, the amount of money now in the Treasury known as the "New Orleans prize-money;" how much has been paid out or is to be distributed, and how much remains undistributed; also, if any salaries or fees have been paid out of said prize-money.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to that resolution. I can tell anybody all about it, better than anybody in the Treasury can.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Does the gentleman object to the reference of the resolution to a committee?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not at all.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Let it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was referred accordingly.

DEFALCATIONS.

Mr. MAGEE. I submit the following resolution for adoption at this time:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish this House with a list of all Government defaulters since March 4, 1869; the amount of defalcation in each case, the amount afterward collected, and whether paid by defaulters or sureties; the number and names of those prosecuted to conviction; the number and names of those pardoned, and the number and names of such defaulting officers who are still in Government employ, together with the aggregate of defalcations since that date.

Mr. GARFIELD. That information has been given several times.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it proposed to pass that resolution or to refer it?

The SPEAKER. To pass it.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I object. I will not object to its reference to a committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This information has been furnished twice, and is now in public documents.

Mr. MAGEE. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

No objection was made, and the resolution was referred accordingly.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 16) providing for a change in the name and title of the agent and consul-general of the United Stafes at Alexandria.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL O. O. HOWARD.

Mr. COBURN. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of War, with the accompanying reports of the Adjutant-General and of Inspector-General Schriver, relating to the alleged defalcations, &c., of Brigadier-General O. O. Howard, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report the following resolution, and recommend its adoption by the House:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, requested to convene a court of inquiry, to consist of not less than five officers of the Army, whose duty it shall be, when so convened, to fully investigate all the charges against Brigadier-General O. O. Howard contained in the communication of the Secretary of War to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, of date December 5, 1873, and to report their opinion thereon to the Secretary of War.

Mr. MAYNARD. Ought there not to be something in the resolution to indicate the grade of the officers of this court of inquiry? The resolution simply says "five officers of the Army."

Mr. COBURN. The President of the United States will be governed in that respect by the Army Regulations.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Allow me to to make a suggestion. Ought it not to be provided that at least one-half of this court of inquiry should be officers who served with colored troops? My reason for making the suggestion is this: when I took command of the colored troops, I found great prejudice against their officers existing among the officers of the regular Army, and I suppose it was natural enough.

I issued an order that where offenses were alleged against officers of colored troops, the court-martial trying them should comprise a majority of officers serving with those troops. The consequence was that complaints against such officers ceased. Now, I do not believe that the feeling of Army officers has changed much since the war. I know that there exists in the minds of one or two officers whom I have heard speak on this subject a prejudice against General Howard because he has been at the head of the Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, a position which they think is not congenia with the dignity of an Army officer.

Mr. COBURN. It may be that some Army officers have such prejudices as the gentleman from Massachusetts speaks of; I do not know how the fact may be; but it is within the discretion of the President to select for this court officers who are free from prejudice. I see no danger in intrusting this investigation to Army officers of high rank and standing, selected by the President. I send to the Clerk, to be read, a letter which General Howard has addressed to the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 17, 1873.

SIR: In accordance with the request of yesterday, received from your committee, I appear to make answer.

As preliminary to a formal rebutting of the charges contained in a letter of the honorable Secretary of War, dated December 4, 1873, and referred to your committee, permit me to state—

1st. That I court the fullest possible examination into all the subjects therein named.

2d. Having never been averse to a trial by any proper tribunal, civil or military, upon official charges with any shadow of foundation, I deprecate the statement of my accuser that "a general court-martial became barred in part under statute of limitation," and if it be legally possible so to do, I wish to waive all rights and privileges accorded me under such statute, to the end that the "public benefit" may receive no detriment.

3d. In considering the alleged irregularities and violations of law in the conduct of the late Freedmen's Bureau, I am confident of my ability clearly to prove that, acting as Commissioner in an administrative capacity, I am neither morally nor legally responsible for either of the several counts set forth in the Secretary's letter; and therefore not personally or officially accountable for any portion of the sum which makes up the aggregate therein charged. Certainly, it is against the usage of every department of Government to hold me pecuniarily accountable for the defalcations of subordinate officers where no collusion whatever is even claimed.

With this brief statement I shall gladly submit to the examination and judgment of the committee the work of the late Freedmen's Bureau, (or such portion of it as may be necessary,) the manner of its performance, and my own record, official and personal, connected with it, with a view to a final and complete settlement of the questions at issue, which have been so annoying to my friends and such a prolific source of public scandal.

Very respectfully,

O. O. HOWARD,
Brigadier-General, U. S. A.

Hon. JOHN COBURN,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] allow me to put to him an inquiry, not in any captious spirit?

Mr. COBURN. Certainly.

Mr. MAYNARD. This investigation will be very laborious and voluminous, extending probably over many years and a large extent of country, involving inquiry into the operations of a great many subordinates and the expenditure of large sums of money. The question I wish to propound to the gentleman is, whether, in the opinion of the Committee on Military Affairs, five officers are better than a larger number? Would not a court composed of seven officers be more desirable for a work of such magnitude?

Mr. COBURN. So far as I know, that point was not discussed in the committee to any extent.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Let me mention to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] that courts of inquiry are very rarely composed of more than three officers; most generally the number is three. The committee thought five would be sufficient in this case.

Mr. MAYNARD. If my memory serves me aright, I have known such courts to be composed of more than five officers.

Mr. COBURN. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the range of this discussion will not be so extensive as he thinks The investigation will not extend over the entire history of the transactions of the Freedmen's Bureau. It will be confined to the particular charges made in the letter of the Secretary of War, which charges are not only very specific and pointed, but are limited as to time, as to persons, and as to amounts. I think the investigation cannot have a very great range.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to make an inquiry. In a hasty examination of the letter of the Secretary of War at the Clerk's desk, I thought it implicated some other officers than General Howard in this matter of deficiency of the funds. This resolution covers only the case of General Howard. Would not the inquiry necessarily lead to an investigation as to the responsibility of these other officers? Why does not the committee propose to extend the inquiry in that way?

Mr. COBURN. That would be a matter of utter impossibility. We cannot tell in advance what other officers may be implicated. The charges are very numerous; and it is always sufficient to try a man upon the charges that are made against him.

Mr. KASSON. But are not other officers named in the letter of the Secretary of War?

Mr. COBURN. Well, those are matters of separate investigation, if Congress should see fit to order it.

Mr. DONNAN. If the developments of this investigation should implicate other officers, the Secretary of War, in pursuance of his duty, will doubtless see that they are dealt with properly.

Mr. KASSON. Are not other officers named in the letter of the Secretary of War?

Mr. COBURN. Yes, sir; General Balloch and others are named.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me a single word?

Mr. COBURN. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have no doubt if this matter were left to the choice of the President, he would endeavor to do justice between the country and General Howard; but by the rules of the service, the officers to constitute this court may have to be told off by the Army Register, and there are not many general officers; so that, constituted under these restrictions, the court might happen to be an unfriendly one. The charges in this case are very grave. The integrity of an officer who did good service during the war, and in that service lost one of his arms, is to be inquired into. He is to stand or fall by the record which is to be thus made; and, indeed, a large portion of the Army are to stand or fall by this record. Therefore I shall ask a vote of the House upon an amendment, to insert after "court of inquiry" these words: "which court shall be composed in part of three general officers who have served in command of colored troops." Does the gentleman from Indiana accept this amendment?

Mr. COBURN. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman allow it to be offered?

Mr. COBURN. I will allow it to be offered, and then I will ask that this matter be recommitted to the committee. I understand that some of the minority of the committee wish to oppose the resolution in whole or in part; and hence it had better be taken up at a future day.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I do not understand that the minority of the committee have any objection to this resolution.

Mr. COBURN. Some gentlemen of the minority have requested me, since I have been upon the floor, to have the matter recommitted.

The SPEAKER. With the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts pending, the resolution will be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. PACKARD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be authorized to employ a clerk during the present session of Congress at the usual rate of compensation.

THE CHORPENNING CLAIM.

Mr. CESSNA. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a petition from sundry citizens of my district; and I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

There was no objection.

Mr. CESSNA. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand, and desire to present to the House, a petition, signed by 201 citizens of Somerset County, Pennsylvania, relative to certain claims of George Chorpenning against the Government of the United States.

This claimant is a citizen of my district, and these petitioners are among the most prominent, intelligent, honorable, and influential of my constituents. Some of them are now occupying, and others have heretofore occupied, prominent positions of honor and trust in their county and in the State. This petition is in the following language, and I ask the Clerk to read it:

The Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned petitioners, of Somerset County, in the State of Pennsylvania, would respectfully represent that on the 23d day of December, 1870, Postmaster-General Creswell did, under authority vested in him by a joint resolution, approved July 15, 1870, award and declare over his official signature and the seal of his Department that there was due and owing to George Chorpenning from the United States the sum of $443,010.60; that said claim grows out of certain contracts for mail service between California and Salt Lake; that said Chorpenning is a native and resident of our county, and is well known to us to be a man of unquestionable honesty and integrity, and is also known to have spent many years of his life in the prosecution of his several mail contracts through the frontier country; that the findings of the Postmaster-General are in part based upon the testimony of A. J. Schell and other citizens of this county, who are known to have been in the employ of Chorpenning on said mail-routes; that the said witnesses are persons of character and respectability, and their statements are entitled to full faith and credit.

That as the Postmaster-General was about to issue his warrant for the above-named award, payment of the same was suspended under mere verbal charges of fraud and corruption, made without specification or support by oath or affirmation, as in such cases by law provided; that said Chorpenning strenuously asserts his innocence of all said charges, and earnestly desires an impartial trial or investigation of his case, whereby the facts may be made known and the right be done: Therefore your petitioners would humbly pray that your honorable bodies will take such action in the matter as will give justice to and protect the rights of an individual citizen. And your petitioners will ever pray, &c., &c.

Mr. CESSNA. Mr. Speaker, I also have, and intend to present, the memorial of this claimant on the subject-matter mentioned in this petition. I propose to present both papers under the rules and refer the same to one of the standing committees of this House.

If at any time hereafter the majority of the House should prefer to raise a select committee to whom these papers shall be referred, with proper authority on the subject, I shall be content with such order. I do not, at this time, propose to interfere with the business of the House by offering resolutions or provoking discussion.

But I do desire, in this public manner, to give notice to every member of this body that these papers will be presented, and earnestly invite the careful attention of every member to the subject of this petition and memorial. Situated as I am, I can do no less than this. The right of petition is sacred and may not be denied to the meanest, poorest, most prostrate citizen of the Republic. All that these petitions request is a full, free, fair, thorough, and impartial investigation by an able and intelligent tribunal. I desire no more than this; but this I do entreat at the hands of the House.

It is because of the peculiar position which I know this matter occupies before the American people that I have desired to accompany the presentation of these papers with these remarks.

I am fully aware that many and repeated charges of fraud and corruption have been heaped upon the head of this claimant, as well as upon all who, in any way, seemed to countenance or aid him, not only in the prosecution of his claim, but even in the seemingly fair and just demand for investigation and trial.

I present these papers not merely from a sense of duty to my constituents, but because I firmly believe that great injustice and wrong have been done, not only to this claimant, but to all who have appeared to believe that there was any merit whatever in his demands.

I am anxious that I, and all who agree with me in opinion, should be undeceived, or that those who differ from us should be shown the truth as we understand it. A fair and honest investigation is what I desire to challenge. In order that this may be obtained, I am not only willing but anxious that the Attorney-General of the United States, the Postmaster-General, and all other officials of the Government, may be notified of the pendency of this case before the committee, and invited and urged to show cause, if any they have, why the prayer of the petitioner should not be granted.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy the time of the House in discussing the merits of this claim at this time, nor to make an argument in its favor. I beg the indulgence of the House, however, for a few minutes, while I state a few of the points in dispute between the claimant and his adversaries. If the merits of the claim, after a careful examination, do not commend it to the judgment of the members of this House, I shall be content. There are two separate and distinct claims mentioned in the memorial; the first arises from two several contracts with the Post-Office Department, made in 1851, for carrying the mails from Sacramento City, California, to Salt Lake City, and an act of Congress for the relief of the contractor, approved March 3, 1857. The second arises upon a contract made in 1858, which was curtailed and afterward entirely annulled by the Postmaster-General.

It has been charged by those who resist this claim, and was so charged by a report of a committee made to this House, January 30, 1871, among other things: First. That this claim had been examined and passed upon by Postmaster-Generals Brown, Blair, Holt, Randall, and Creswell; by the Court of Claims, and by the Committee on Claims in this House, and that, after an examination and consideration, it was in each case rejected by these several tribunals. To these charges the claimant answers a full, complete, and positive denial. This issue, he prays, may be examined and passed upon by this House. He concedes that Postmaster-General Brown did pass upon the first part of his claim, but in his report made to Congress December, 1857, he expressly declared that he could find nothing in the act throwing light on the subject in dispute, and that in this case, as in every case of doubt, the Government was entitled to the benefit of that doubt until Congress by some new enactment should remove it.

The Committees on Post-Offices and Post-Roads in the Senate and House addressed a letter to the Postmaster-General declaring that his construction of the act of Congress was erroneous.

This letter was signed by William Bigler, William M. Gwin, G. N. Fitch, J. P. Hale, James Dixon, and J. B. Henderson, of the Senate, and William H. English, P. Powell, J. M. Wood, V. B. Horton, T. Davis, J. Craig, R. Davis, and J. D. C. Atkins, of the House.

Postmaster-General Brown died without reconsidering the case after his report, and no one can tell what effect this letter produced upon his mind, or whether he ever read it.

No other Postmaster-General ever considered or passed upon the merits of this claim prior to July 15, 1870. Messrs. Blair, Holt, Randall, and Creswell severally refused to open the case or re-examine the same without congressional action, upon the ground that the decision of Postmaster-General Brown was conclusive, and the matter was res adjudicata.

The Court of Claims refused to entertain the case upon the same ground, for want of jurisdiction. The Committee on Claims of this House never passed upon the case, nor made any report thereon. This claimant, therefore, has never had an examination of his case by any tribunal except the doubtful report of Mr. Brown made to Congress, in which he seemed to invite further legislation, and to ask the opinion of Congress on the construction of the act they had passed.

Mr. Brown died before receiving such information. This relates entirely to the first part of the claim. True, this House and the country have been made to believe that all of this claim was considered by Mr. Brown, and yet the contract upon which Mr. Creswell awarded $205,993.12 was not originally made until after Postmaster-General Brown was dead and buried.

Second. It is charged that Major Chorpenning was a bad man and did not faithfully perform his part of these contracts. He answers in the language of the Postmaster-General to a Hartford bank, "He (Chorpenning) is our model contractor," and to President Buchanan, to whom he said, "If Mr. Chorpenning cannot succeed in the enterprise, we have no contractor in the Department that can." "He is the best man I have for that work."

Third. It has been charged that $233,617.95 have already been paid above the contract price on account of the first part of this claim. This is expressly denied by the claimant, who says that only $79,072.95 were so paid.

Fourth. It is charged in this connection that the contract price was only $106,000, and that, therefore, the extra compensation was greatly disproportionate. This, too, is emphatically denied by the claimant, who avers that his contract price was $940,333.33, and that the extra allowance was greatly below the justice and honesty of the case.

Fifth. It is charged that the change of route, via San Pedro, whereby the distance was largely increased, was made at the instance of the contractor. This is conceded, but it was done in accordance with his duty. The route originally named in the contract was an experiment, and proved to be utterly impassable. The Postmaster-General accepted and adopted the change, and Congress, with a full knowledge of all the facts, ratified the action of the Postmaster-General, and passed the law of March 3, 1857, for the relief of the contractor.

Sixth. It is charged that the Congress of 1857 gave too much additional compensation, although it is admitted by those who make this charge that the original bargain was a hard contract. The claimant, in answer to this charge, avers that his original contracts of $12,500 and $14,000 were taken from him without cause, and given to another party at $50,000; that the Postmaster-General conceded his error, admitted he had annulled the contracts without cause, and restored them to Major Chorpenning with a promise that the price should be raised not to fifty, but to thirty thousand dollars; that the whole of this question was laid before Congress, and the contracts changed accordingly, by the act of March 3, 1867.

Seventh. It is charged that the act of 1857 was cunningly procured in the interest of claimant, by confining the Postmaster-General, in examining the case, to the "affidavits and proofs on file in the House of Representatives." To this it is answered that the contrary thereof is the fact. This limitation and restriction worked greatly to the injury of the contractor. He could have procured much additional evidence had the way been open to him so to do. His contract was in operation when the law was passed, and by the very terms of the law he lost all advantages accruing between the dates of his affidavits on file and the making of the award by the Postmaster-General.

Eighth. It is charged that the last part of the claim allowed by Postmaster-General Creswell, to wit, $205,993.12, was made upon a contract which provided for its own alteration or annulment; that the penalty was only one month's pay; that this had been allowed and accepted, and, generally, that this claim had often before been considered and rejected by various tribunals; that the whole amount was allowed for damages; that the whole claim was fraudulent and that no part thereof should be paid. To all of this it is earnestly answered that the contract in providing for its curtailment or annulment set forth the specific reasons for which these things might be done. That it was curtailed because Congress failed to pass the Post-Office appropriation bill; that this was not one of the reasons mentioned in the contract; that it was annulled for reasons given by the Postmaster-General, not one of which was true, or had any existence in point of fact; that this the Postmaster-General himself admitted, and the proofs on file abundantly show. In this connection, it is further averred that this claim was never presented to, much less considered by, any tribunal, except the Forty-first Congress and Postmaster-General Creswell in the fall of 1870; that of the $132,361.07 allowed by him in his award of December 23, 1870, $205,993.12 were actually due from the Government to this contractor, and that only $73,632.05 were allowed to him for an unjust and cruel curtailment and annulment of his contract, whereby his utter ruin was accomplished and he reduced to beggary and want.

It is further averred and fully proved that this contractor had expended more than $200,000 in building houses, making roads and bridges, more than seven hundred miles along this route; that all of these were taken from him and given to his successors, and that $535,271 were paid to these same successors for the completion of the work under the contract wrongfully taken from him; and it is fully proved that the actual loss incurred by this contractor on this part of his case exceeded the sum of $300,000.

Ninth. It is charged by some that something improper was done by Postmaster-General Creswell in making his award in favor of claimant for $443,010.60 on the 23d of December, 1870, and by others that the act of July 15th, 1870, was so drawn in the interest of the claimant, that the Postmaster-General was obliged to make the award he did, and that he does not believe the amount was honestly due to Major Chorpenning. To this it is answered that the claimant, believing that Mr. Creswell might be affected by the cry of fraud so extensively raised against him, was scarcely willing to submit to his decision, and, therefore, reserved the right of appeal to the Court of Claims. That the Postmaster-General is clearly of opinion that the money awarded is justly due without regard to the terms of the law. That the law of 1870 was based upon that of 1857, and that this was passed after full and complete examination, and free discussion of all the facts of the case, at a time when everything connected with the same was recent and fresh and easily understood. That not one of the Postmasters-General to whose attention the case has been brought has ever uttered one word against the honesty of the claim, but simply refused its consideration for want of jurisdiction. That the law of 1857 was framed in the interest of the Government, and not in that of the contractor. That the law was passed July 15, 1870, and the award made December 23, 1870. That Congress had then been in session more than two weeks. That the Postmaster-General was a Cabinet officer—one of the highest officials of the Government. That he was able and careful to guard her interests, and, if he had found, or believed, that Congress had passed an act which was likely to give to any citizen an unjust advantage of his Government, he would have promptly reported that fact to Congress before proceeding to execute the provisions of the law. That he did not do so is conclusive evidence of his full faith and belief in the justice and honesty of the claim and of the fairness of the award he had made thereon.

Tenth. It is alleged that the law of 1870 was repealed in 1871, and that the award of Mr. Creswell for $443,010.60 fell with such repeal; also, that this subject was again investigated by the Committee on Appropriations in the Forty-first Congress. To this the claimant responds that no just, fair, intelligent, or legal investigation was made; that he never was notified to appear, nor permitted to appear before that committee, either in person or by attorney; that he was not allowed to furnish a single witness or a paper for examination by the committee; and that although charges of fraud and crime were freely made against him, he was never permitted even to know his accuser, much less to see and cross-examine him. That but a single witness was sworn and examined on either side, and this witness was Postmaster-General Creswell; that all the evidence which produced the repealing act of 1871 was the whispering and inuendoes of evil-disposed and wicked persons, who were guilty of the very frauds and corruptions which they falsely charged upon this claimant; and that he verily believes that they basely conspired together to accomplish his ruin, by making insinuations against him to members of Congress, because he would not comply with their demands by paying a very large sum of money to purchase their virtuous silence.

It is further averred and believed that the repealing act of 1871 is an absolute nullity. There is always an implied contract at least between the citizen and his government. There are certain rights, duties, and obligations from the one to the other; these are, or at least should be, reciprocal. In the case now under consideration there were contracts expressed as well as implied. Differences arose between the parties in regard to the true intent and meaning of these contracts. The Government, through its Legislature, declared the nature and meaning of some of them.

Finally, in 1870, the Government and the citizen agreed upon terms for the settlement of certain disputes and differences theretofore existing between them. The Postmaster-General, an officer of the Government, was appointed arbitrator or umpire to examine and pass upon these disputes and differences, and to make an award and render judgment between the parties. After a long, full, patient, and conscientious examination of all the matters in dispute, the Postmaster-General performed his duties, made his award, and rendered his judgment. It stands upon his records to-day with the great seal of the Post-Office Department of the United States duly attached. The law was executed; the umpire was discharged; his duties were fully performed and finished.

The attempt of Congress to withdraw the submission comes too late. The effort is a weak attempt at repudiation.

Mr. Speaker, I have simply stated a few of the issues between the parties to this controversy. They are vital to the one party, involving all of his property of every character, his good name and reputation, and the character of himself and family, and all their hopes of the future, whether they shall be vindicated, or their very names left a by-word and reproach to posterity. That the magnitude of this controversy has assumed dimensions far beyond what I supposed them to be when in the Forty-first Congress, I fully concede. That I had then, or have now, any knowledge of any fraud or corruption, or wrong, I most solemnly deny. Since that time I have gone before my constituents in the district where this claimant resides, and facing the report made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the Forty-first Congress—as published in all the papers there opposed to my election—and, with the arguments contained in that report hurled at my head from almost every stump in the district, I have been vindicated. Those to whom I am best known, and whose confidence I most desire to retain, have fully acquitted me of the many charges made against me for the simple performance of a plain duty. Yet I am anxious that not only at home, but everywhere, and especially in this House, should my actions and conduct in the premises be properly understood and appreciated. If I am in error I am anxious to be convinced and willing to acknowledge it. If the House was in error in passing the repealing act of 1871, it is due to fairness, to justice, to truth, and to right that this unfortunate and now prostrate citizen should have an opportunity of manifesting that error. No man can or will say that he ever has had any hearing or trial on this question. All I ask is a consideration and examination of the questions submitted by the citizens of Somerset County, and the prayer of this memorialist.

The Government of the United States cannot afford to deny this reasonable request. When granted, I trust the investigation will be full, thorough, searching, and complete.

I thank the House for the leave granted to make this explanation relative to the papers I intend to present.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had concurred in the resolution of the House that when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, the 19th instant, they shall stand adjourned till Monday, the 5th of January next.

It further announced that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 140) to amend an act of Congress to expedite and regulate the printing of public documents, approved June 25, 1864, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

It further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles without amendments:

An act (H. R. No. 34) authorizing the Second National Bank of Havana, New York, to change its name;

An act (H. R. No. 418) to authorize the First National Bank of Saint Anthony, Minnesota, to change its location and name; and

An act (H. R. No. 614) to so amend the laws relative to internal revenue as to allow distillery warehouses to be continued in use after changes have occurred in the management of the business.

CHARLES W. PIERCE, ETC.

Mr. HAYS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 842) for the relief of Charles W. Pierce, of Nebraska, and Jacob C. Brubaker, of Maryland; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES F. CARR.

Mr. GOOCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 843) for the relief of Charles F. Carr, of Boston, Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

THE CHORPENNING CASE.

The House resumed the consideration of Mr. CESSNA'S reference to the Chorpenning case.

Mr. DAWES. I desire the attention of the House for a few moments. I do not desire in seeking the floor to oppose the reference of these papers to any proper committee for investigation. No citizen of the United States who feels he has a grievance should be turned away from these Halls when he seeks in proper language for an investigation and for redress, if any wrong has been done him.

I should have said nothing upon this occasion if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] had pursued the ordinary course in making his request. Instead of waiting until after the investigation, so that the House could have had the facts before it, my friend from Pennsylvania has seen fit, what nobody who has any great confidence in his case is apt to do, to argue it before it is heard, and to tell this House——

Mr. CESSNA. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DAWES. Not now.

Mr. CESSNA. Very well.

Mr. DAWES. And to tell this House beforehand, while making a request for an investigation to establish disputed facts, that the facts are so and so, and that reports of committees of Congress that state they are not so are false. That is unusual; that is what I have to say.

He has also taken the liberty in coming here and asking for an investigation of a great grievance and wrong that he alleges has been done his friend and constituent to make a charge upon the committees of Congress in these words:

> That no just, fair, intelligent, or legal investigation was made by the Congress that has gone through with the form of such an investigation.

And, so far as the gentleman's personal connection with this matter is concerned, he and I, and he and the Congress in which this transpired, never had any words. Nobody ever sought to do anything or say anything in reference to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he himself at the time ever thought was unjust. I had the assurance of the gentleman at the time that he felt as if he had been dealt kindly with. And why, having asked for an opportunity to make a personal explanation to his heart's content once in this matter, why he did not feel satisfied with his own explanation I do not know, nor do I trouble the House to inquire. But, sir, when he insists in advance, before a proper inquiry, on telling this House how this and how former Congresses have been unfair and unjust, I beg him to state to this House what the action of a former Congress was upon the unanimous report of a committee before whom every party having the slightest interest whatever in the case was invited to appear, and who heard every party seeking any opportunity to be heard as long and as fully as they desired; upon the unanimous report of such a committee, and after as long a discussion in the House of Representatives as anybody in the House wished, with the gentleman sitting here, where, if he could not be heard as a member, he might suggest anything he pleased—and I do not know that he was a member; I do not state that, because I am not certain about it. But, whether he was a member or not, he was around here, and having an opportunity to be heard if anything unjust or wrong was submitted to the House. Under these circumstances, sir, the House unanimously passed their judgment in conformity to the unanimous report of the committee of the House. It went to the other branch. It was there referred to a standing committee of that branch, and there before that committee written answers and arguments were presented, and personal appearance was made, to the gentleman, of everybody he desired to be heard. And a unanimous report of the committee in the other branch was, so far as I know, unanimously agreed to by that branch, in conformity with the report which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has seen fit to say was unfair, unjust, and adopted without opportunity to the party interested of being heard.

I do not ask the House to listen to the merits of this case. I am quite as conscious as the gentleman from Pennsylvania or anybody else of the liability of that committee to make a mistake. I shall be willing, quite as cheerful and readily as any man in this House, to correct any mistake whenever I shall have that mistake pointed out to me; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not find me slow in doing justice to his constituent, if upon re-examination of the case I find that justice has not been already done.

But, sir, what I complain of here as unusual is, that the gentleman has prepared in his room, by himself, so careful and long a statement as that, and without notice to parties whom he indirectly thus arraigns here in this House, should have come here to ask an investigation, jumping before he gets to the stile, and insisting upon declaring and arguing the case before the facts are in, and thus characterizing the unanimous report of two committees of both branches of Congress as an unjust and unfair treatment of this matter.

It may be, sir, and I do not lift my voice to say that it is not the case, that this gentleman wants a rehearing, and if he wants a rehearing, so far as I am concerned he shall have it, but I will withhold any expression of opinion to this House upon the character of the claim till the committee which shall have it in charge shall report upon all the facts; and then if I find that any act of mine in connection with it has done injustice to anybody I will see to it that justice is done to him. But for a gentleman to come to this House before any such investigation has been made, and to demand investigation in one word, and condemn in another what has been done—to assert that his client seeks a trial, and then to tell the House what is to be the result of that trial—is a different way of transacting business from what I have been in the habit of pursuing.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. I have not kept up with this whole debate, but, at the time this matter was exposed before in the House, why did not the gentleman from Pennsylvania then rise and answer the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and myself?

Mr. CESSNA. I propose to say a few words, very briefly, because I have already trespassed on the time of the House too long, to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts, and in answering him I shall answer the question of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I want to hear the answer.

Mr. CESSNA. The gentleman shall hear it. In answer to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts that this is not the regular course to pursue, I will simply say that if I had pursued the usual course I should have been prepared to receive charges from all quarters that I had done this thing in a quiet, sly way, without allowing the public to know it. I prefer to give this open and public notice by reason of the magnitude of the claim and the circumstances surrounding it. That is an answer to the first proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman misapprehended in part the statement I have made to the House. Instead of going on to make an argument myself I expressly endeavored to refrain from so doing. I did, however, present briefly, and in as strong language as I thought the occasion would justify, the answer and reply of my constituent against whom these charges have been made. And now I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] that I do not desire to get up a personal controversy either with the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means or with the gentleman; but I state in the presence of this House and the country that I did desire to go before that committee, and that my constituent asked to go before them.

Mr. BECK. What committee?

Mr. CESSNA. The committee of which the gentleman was a member and which made the investigation which has been referred to.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CESSNA. Not now, if the gentleman pleases. I state here on my veracity that my constituent has reported to me again and again that he had no notice, and that he was never before the committee; and I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Kentucky, or any other man in this House or anywhere, at any time, to name the witness, or to name the lawyer, or to name the party who ever appeared before that committee on behalf of my constituent.

Mr. DAWES. I will answer you.

Mr. BECK. One word, if you please.

Mr. CESSNA. I have no objection to the gentleman's word, but the same courtesy was not extended to me.

Mr. BECK. The check was about to be paid to this man, when the gentleman from Massachusetts ascertained the facts and came in here and exposed the whole matter on the floor of this House, and I sustained him; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania sat silent here and did not even avow himself as the member who brought in the bill.

Mr. CESSNA. Certainly. I had no desire, nor have I now, that the Treasury of the United States should pay one farthing to my constituents or to any one of them—not one farthing—unless he is justly entitled to receive it.

I went to the chairman of the committee and told him that I was called home by dangerous illness in my family; and while I was gone whatever was done was done; and when I returned the first thing I knew was that the report was to be made. I do not mean to say that it was not done properly or that there was anything wrong about it. I was willing that the matter should be examined, but my constituent assures me that he was never before the committee in person, never by attorney, never by witnesses; and if that is so, while I have no personal interest in the matter, I ask that the case shall be examined. The gentleman from Massachusetts says that I charged thus and so. I have only given the language of my constituent; not, as the gentleman says, of my client, but of my constituent, who informs me and assures me that he was never present in person or by attorney. I had not then made such an examination of the claim as would have enabled me to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts, nor had I any feeling or desire to impeach anything the gentleman believed to be right, nor did I throw any obstacles in his way in any shape or form. He has expressed a willingness on his part for a fair investigation, and that is all I ask. I beg pardon of the House for the time I have consumed.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CESSNA. Certainly, I will.

Mr. DAWES. You say your constituent asked to be heard; now, tell us whom he asked.

Mr. CESSNA. I say here before the gentleman, before you, Mr. Speaker, and before this House and the country, that I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts to give my constituent a hearing. I say that, and I would not assert it if the gentleman had not asked me to do so.

Mr. DAWES. I answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I told him the committee would be glad to hear him and his constituent when and where and whenever and as long as he pleased. Now, I say further to this House, that while no attorney for his constituent appeared in the committee-room, the attorney of his constituent, while the examination was going on, contented himself with personal interviews with the members of the committee to explain and to argue and to persuade. He knew the investigation was going on; he knew the door of the committee-room was open, but he preferred his own method of persuading and convincing the committee. The Postmaster-General was there; everybody was there who desired to be. No mortal man ever lifted his voice to say that he had not been heard there until after the same thing was repeated at the other end of the Capitol, and judgment was there pronounced unanimously, as it had been pronounced here.

Mr. CESSNA. A single word. I do not desire or wish to contradict the gentleman as to what the attorney did or said. I had no knowledge on that subject; I wanted none. I did not want to throw anything in the way of the committee or of the House doing justice. I was just as loath as any man in this House to do anything at all whereby I might seem to be desirous of retarding an examination or report, or the stopping the payment of any amount which the members of this House did not think was honestly due from the Treasury.

Mr. BECK. I repeat that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] was in this House when the chairman of the committee made the most frightful exposé I ever heard on this floor; and I backed him and indorsed him because it was true. Yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania sat here and never opened his mouth, and did not even avow his agency in this matter. And it ill becomes him now, two years afterward, to come here and make this statement.

Mr. DAWES. I hope these papers will be referred to some fair committee, and let us have another report.

The SPEAKER. To what committee?

Mr. CESSNA. I have scarcely consulted about the matter.

Mr. MAYNARD. Let them be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CESSNA. I believe this is more a question of law than anything else, and I prefer the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. My impression is that this matter was before the Committee on Claims some years ago, when I was a member of that committee. The first time it appears on the statute-books was in March, 1857.

Mr. DAWES. That was before you were on the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MAYNARD. I know; but the matter subsequently came up before that committee when I was upon it, and I believe it should go there now.

Mr. DAWES. I have no choice in the matter.

Mr. CESSNA. I will consult in regard to it. My judgment is that the Committee on the Judiciary is the most appropriate. It may be that it should go to the Committee on Claims or the Committee on Appropriations. I will claim my right under the rule to indicate the committee.

The SPEAKER. The papers must be referred to some committee, or the gentleman may withdraw them.

Mr. CESSNA. I have not yet presented any papers, only given notice that I intend to do so.

Mr. DAWES. This is only a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. Then the subject is not before the House.

PROMULGATION OF ARMY REGULATIONS.

Mr. COBURN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 844) to authorize the promulgation of the general regulations for the Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. WALLACE presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of South Carolina, asking Congress to grant relief for the present financial embarrassment by authorizing the issue of an additional amount of currency; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

EDWARD LOPEZ MULRENAN.

Mr. PURMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 845) for the relief of Edward Lopez Mulrenan, of Key West, Florida; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES JOHNSON.

Mr. MERRIAM. I ask that the following resolution be now adopted:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to the legal representatives of Charles Johnson, late a messenger in the House of Representatives, a sum equal to the salary of a messenger for three months.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that resolution will be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not object to the reference.

Mr. MERRIAM. Very well; let it be so referred.

The resolution was referred accordingly.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to call the attention of the House—I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. DONNAN] in his seat—to a bill which has come over from the Senate, and which seems designed to prevent an unnecessary expense that may accrue during the recess. I ask the House to listen to the reading of the bill, because I think it would be well to pass it now.

The bill (S. No. 140) to amend the act of Congress to expedite and regulate the printing of public documents, approved June 25, 1864, was then taken from the Speaker's table and read.

The bill provides that so much of the first section of the act of Congress to expedite and regulate the printing of public documents as directs the publication in one volume of the President's message and executive documents, and an abridgment of the accompanying reports, for popular distribution, be repealed, and that so much of the resolutions of Congress, or of either House, as requires the publication of extra documents for popular distribution be suspended.

Mr. HOLMAN. This seems to apply to the abridgment of the message and documents.

Mr. MAYNARD. To all documents.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it should pass.

Mr. DONNAN. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is right.

The bill was accordingly read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

REORGANIZATION OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 846) to provide for the reorganization of the Treasury Department of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and, (at three o'clock and, forty-five minutes p. m.,) in accordance with a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, the House adjourned to Monday, January 5, 1874, at twelve o'clock m.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BASS: The memorial of Julius Francis and 50 other citizens of Buffalo, New York, that the 12th day of February, being the birthday of Abraham Lincoln, be declared a national holiday.

By Mr. CESSNA: The petition of the bar of Adams County, Pennsylvania, and other citizens of Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the general bankrupt act.

Also, the petition of 201 citizens of Somerset County, Pennsylvania, praying for a legal investigation of the rights of George Chorpenning, arising from an award made in his favor by the Postmaster-General, and the several contracts and acts of Congress upon which said award was founded.

Also, the memorial of George Chorpenning, of Somerset, Pennsylvania, praying for a legal investigation of his rights arising from an award made in his favor by the Postmaster-General, and the several contracts and acts of Congress upon which said award was founded.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The petition of Margaret O'Connor, for a pension.

By Mr. FRYE: The petition of Hugo Wedeless, praying compensation for depredations committed upon his property in February, 1867, by Arapahoe Indians.

By Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia: The petition of Mary Byrd Dallas, praying to be restored to the pension-rolls.

By Mr. HYNES: The petition of over four hundred citizens of Ouachita and Nevada Counties, Arkansas, for the establishment of a post-road from Camden, Ouachita County, to Prescott, (on Cairo and Fulton Railroad,) Arkansas.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of John Wanamaker, president, and many other officers of the Young Men's Christian Association of Philadelphia, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry on the alcoholic liquor traffic.

Also, the memorial of the Radical Club of Philadelphia, praying Congress to avoid an increase of taxation, and replenish the Treasury by saving the $20,000,000 gold paid annually as a premium to the national banks for keeping in circulation notes printed at the cost of the people of the United States and substituted for Government notes or greenbacks.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL: The petition of William H. Ward, of Auburn, New York, asking that he receive proper remuneration for the use by the Government of his bullet-machine patented in 1857.

By Mr. MCJUNKIN: The petition of Charles C. Coulter, a soldier of the war of 1812, for pension, with 66 citizens of Washington Township, in the county of Butler, Pennsylvania, who join in the prayer thereof.

By Mr. PURMAN: The petition in behalf of Southern Methodist publishing house of Nashville, Tennessee.

By Mr. STOWELL: The petition of John Guthrie, a soldier of the war of 1812, desiring to have his name placed upon the pension-roll.

Also, the petition relative to the special internal revenue taxes imposed and known as taxes under Schedule C, signed by W. F. Spotswood & Co., all druggists and apothecaries of Petersburgh, Virginia.

Also, the petition for the relief of the South Methodist publishing house, signed by G. H. Gilmer, judge, and others.

By Mr. SWANN: The petition of Aehsa G. and Sarah L. Wilkins, of Baltimore, Maryland, in relation to property sold for taxes.

By Mr. WALDRON: The petition of G. L. Emerson and others, of Wright, Hillsdale County, Michigan, asking that all mail matter, whether letters or newspapers, be prepaid at the office of mailing.

POST-ROUTE BILLS INTRODUCED.

By Mr. COOK: A bill to establish a mail-route from Alloppa, in Berrien County, to Irwinville, in Irwin County.

By Mr. VANCE: A bill to amend an act establishing a post-route from Chilhowee, Tennessee, to Franklin, North Carolina, extending the said route to take in Charleston, County of Swain, State of North Carolina.

By Mr. WALDRON: A bill to establish a post-route from Chelsea, by Unadilla, Plainfield, and Iosco, to Fowlersville, in the State of Michigan.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 5, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, December 19, 1873, was read and approved.

Hon. J. W. FLANAGAN, of Texas, and Hon. WILLIAM M. STEWART, of Nevada, appeared in their seats to-day.

COMPENSATION OF SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the report of the Secretary of the Senate, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of December 17, 1873, furnishing information as to the salaries and allowances of Senators and Representatives in Congress since the beginning of the Government; which, on motion of Mr. DAVIS, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I present the petition of Abraham Lansing, of Cambridgeport, Massachusetts, asking for an increase of his pension. He is now eighty-one years old. His case is one of singular hardship. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Pensions, and ask the attention of that committee to it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented a memorial of business men of New Bedford, Massachusetts, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHANDLER presented two memorials, numerously signed by merchants and business men of Detroit, Michigan, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law, and asking for its modification; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Samuel Spaulding, of Michigan, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRATT presented a petition of citizens of New Albany, Indiana, praying that Thomas Crawford, a soldier of the Mexican war, be placed on the pension roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Posey County, Indiana, praying for an appropriation to remove a tow-head and sand-bar in front of the town of Mount Vernon; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PRATT. I also present a memorial of sundry citizens of Indianapolis, Indiana, embracing the wholesale dealers in that city, and among the best men in it. Referring to the bankrupt law and the proposed repeal of it, they say that in their opinion "said law might be improved and modified in certain respects, so as to extend the time to, say, sixty days instead of fourteen days for the payment of unpaid matured commercial paper;" and also that there should be a reduction in costs attending bankrupt-court proceedings. "Amended as above," they say, "we believe the present law will be promotive of sound business interests, and that its absolute repeal at present would be inexpedient and unwise." I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of H. C. Fuller and 55 others, citizens of Prairie Plains, Kansas, praying for the amendment of the postal laws; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of J. Collar and 146 other citizens of Kansas, asking that an amendment be made to the law relating to the growth of timber on the western prairies; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the petition of Rev. R. F. Nicola, George T. Downing, David E. Howard, Job Fry, John Andrews, George Henry, and about 500 other colored citizens of Rhode Island, asking for the passage of the bill known as Charles Sumner's supplementary civil-rights bill. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CROZIER presented the petition of Wilson A. Peckham and 74 others, citizens of Kansas, praying for the establishment of an additional land district in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented the petition of Frederick B. Zidier, of Hartford, Connecticut, praying to be indemnified for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOWE presented the memorial of Harney & Livesey, of Madison, Wisconsin, asking compensation for labor, materials, and damages under a contract to build a bridge at Rock Island; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FENTON presented a petition of a large number of professional and business men of the city of Syracuse, New York, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SCOTT. I present the petition of Thomas Mendenhall and a number of other citizens of Pennsylvania, praying Congress to take steps in co-operation with other governments for the settlement of international difficulties by arbitration and without a resort to arms. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I also present a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, praying for the appointment of a commission to inquire into the results of the traffic in alcoholic liquors. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance, as I believe other petitions on the same subject have been sent to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCREERY presented a petition of G. B. Tyler and E. B. Luckett, praying to be reimbursed for certain moneys alleged to have been illegally collected as tax on whisky manufactured by W. T. Cheatham; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FLANAGAN presented the petition of the mayor of the city of Jefferson, Texas, and other citizens of that place, praying for the removal of the district court of the United States for the western district of Texas from Tyler to Jefferson; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I present a memorial numerously signed by citizens of Portland, Maine, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law, and they conclude by saying that they respectfully submit "that the present is a favorable time for the revisal and improvement of the present system, but that its total abrogation would be disastrous to the interests of the business community." I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who have the subject under consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY presented a petition of officers and soldiers who served in the Mexican war, now residing in the State of Oregon and Washington Territory, praying Congress to pass an act to place the surviving soldiers of that war on the pension roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SARGENT. I present a memorial of the house-carpenters of the Eight-hour League of San Francisco, California, protesting against the repeal of the eight-hour law, and recommending that Mr. A. B. Mullett be rebuked by the Government for his report in favor of such repeal. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON presented a petition of citizens of North Carolina, praying for the transfer of Chatham and Orange Counties, in that State, from the western to the eastern judicial district, and for the holding of stated terms of the United States district court at Raleigh; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of R. H. Jones, executor of Wesley Jones, late United States marshal for the district of North Carolina, praying the payment of an unsettled balance due the estate of Wesley Jones for taking the census of 1860; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALLISON. I present the memorial of John T. Hancock & Co. and 91 others, representing the business interests of the city of Dubuque, Iowa, protesting against the repeal of the bankrupt law. I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented the petition of Mary E. Grosvenor, widow of the late Thomas W. Grosvenor, lieutenant-colonel of the Twelfth Illinois Cavalry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of James Bremner, praying for the repeal of the act exempting church property from taxation in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Eliza S. Constant, praying indemnity for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of James A. Hyde, late captain of Company A, One hundred and twentieth Regiment New York Volunteers, praying for arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Barnet Simonson, of New York, praying to be allowed a bounty-land warrant and a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the memorial of Audley W. Gazzon, of the city of New York, being a remonstrance against the repeal of the bankrupt law and suggestions touching its amendment. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also a memorial, numerously signed by business men of Brooklyn, New York, remonstrating against the total repeal of the bankrupt law, and suggesting that it be retained with modifications. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a similar memorial, signed by business men of the city of New York in considerable numbers. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the petition of 51 business firms; national and private banks; the county officers and local bar of the county of Lewis, in the State of New York, praying for the absolute repeal of the bankrupt law. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I also present a petition, very numerously signed by citizens of the county of Lewis, asking Congress to sweep away the bankrupt law, with all its amendments, from the statute-book of the nation. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the petition of a large number of citizens of the city of Syracuse, in the State of New York, and elsewhere in the county of Onondaga, praying the entire and immediate repeal of the bankrupt law. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying amendments of the postal laws so as to require prepayment of postage on all matter, and the better regulation of the salaries of postmasters; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CAMERON presented the memorial of the Merchants' Association of Philadelphia, suggesting modifications in the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of C. A. Finley, on the Army retired list, praying for equal pay with officers of his rank; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of Joshua H. Butterworth, praying for an extension of his patent on improvements in bank and safe locks; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Harlan County, Nebraska, praying for an amendment of the "forest-culture" act; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SCHURZ, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Benjamin Fish, praying compensation for horses and harness captured during the late war, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of the trustees of the German Evangelical church at Martinsburgh, West Virginia, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

BANKRUPTCY ACT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 792) to repeal an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto, to report the same back with sundry amendments, and with these amendments the committee are of opinion that the bill ought to pass. I will state that one of the amendments, which will show that we are not in favor of absolute repeal, is to change the title into "A bill to amend the bankrupt act," instead of repealing it altogether. I believe I am justified in saying that substantially the committee agree upon the principles and substance of the amendments that ought to be made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 231) to regulate and facilitate commerce across the navigable rivers forming the boundary of States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 232) to regulate the fees received from certain steam-vessels sailing coastwise and foreign; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 233) for the incorporation of the National Washington Home; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WRIGHT. Petitions on that subject and a similar bill have been referred to the Committee on Finance, and I move that this bill take the same direction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 234) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint C. W. Cronk a first assistant engineer in the Navy of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 235) to provide for a commission to prepare and report to Congress a bill or bills with reference to the enactment of a general shipping act, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 236) more effectually to provide for the security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 237) to change the name of the port of San Pedro, California, to Wilmington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 238) permitting James McDonald, a warrant officer of the Navy, to accept a silver medal from the government of Italy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 239) to withhold from sale a portion of the Fort Smith military reservation in Arkansas, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 240) to establish certain post-roads in the State of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 241) to confirm the title to certain lands on the Fort Kearney military reservation in Fremont County, Iowa; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 242) for the relief of Enos Lowe, late receiver of public moneys at Council Bluffs, Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. KELLY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 243) for the relief of Charles W. Denton, of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. STEVENSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 5) to supply certain vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution. It provides that the vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class "other than members of Congress" be filled by the appointment of Asa Gray of Massachusetts, in place of Louis Agassiz, deceased, J. D. Dana of Connecticut, in place of Theodore D. Woolsey, Alexander T. Stewart of New York, in place of William B. Astor, whose terms have expired, and that John Maclean of New Jersey, and Peter Parker of Washington City, whose terms have expired, be reappointed.

Mr. STEVENSON. These appointments have been agreed upon by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, and they are to supply all vacancies in that Board.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SUMNER. I ask if that is the report of a committee or a simple resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest that it should be considered by a committee. I honor all the gentlemen named in the resolution; still I think it has been customary to consider such resolutions in committee.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have no objection to its reference to a committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the resolution ought to be referred to the Committee on the Library, which has general charge of the Smithsonian Institution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIM OF W. T. CHEATHAM.

Mr. McCREERY submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish to the Senate the papers on file with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in the case of W. T. Cheatham, distiller in the second district of Kentucky, with an opinion from said Commissioner of Internal Revenue as to the equity of a drawback of $164 alleged to have been improperly and unlawfully collected by the revenue officers of said district.

USE OF OFFICIAL STAMPS BY DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. CRAGIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, of the Interior Department, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General, be requested to furnish to the Senate, with the number of officers and employés in or connected with their respective Departments, (classified so as to designate the name of the office,) who are furnished, directly or otherwise, with official postage-stamps for the purpose of paying postage on official correspondence; and also to state whether or not it is customary, where letters are written to persons not officers or employés of their respective Departments, asking for information, to inclose official stamps for return postage.

TEMPORARY LOANS BY THE TREASURY.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That in order to prevent inflation of the currency and to meet the necessities of the Government, the Committee on Finance be requested to consider the expediency of reporting a bill to the Senate which shall empower the Secretary of the Treasury to make temporary loans, and which shall authorize national-banking associations to use certificates of indebtedness issued for such loans as a part of their reserve; also to provide for the redemption and cancellation of legal-tender notes equal in amount to those which have been, or which may be hereafter, paid out of the $44,000,000 heretofore held by the Secretary.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask that that resolution go over and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan objects to the consideration of the resolution. It will lie over and be printed.

REDUCTION OF SALARIES.

Mr. WRIGHT. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for a reduction of 10 per cent. on the compensation of all officers whose salaries exceed $1,000, or who are paid more than five dollars per day; said reduction to be either permanent or for such time as the committee may deem advisable.

Mr. CAMERON. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

NATIONAL BANKING LAW.

Mr. PRATT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire whether the national banking law should not be so amended as to prohibit the stockholders and officers of a national bank from being concerned in the business of private banking in or near the locality of the national bank, whereby the means of such bank may be employed to produce a greater rate of interest than is allowed by law.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask that the bill which came from the House of Representatives before the recess, and which was read once, be taken up and read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 795) making an appropriation to pay the salaries of the official reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House was read a second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 27th ultimo, approved and signed the bill (S. No. 130) to remove the disabilities of Thomas S. Bocock, E. J. Harvie, and Daniel Trigg, of Virginia, and John H. Reagan, of Texas.

OFFICIAL SALARIES.

Mr. WRIGHT. It will be remembered that on the last day before the recess I reported from the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment amendments to the House bill on the subject of salaries, and then gave notice that on the next Monday I should ask leave to call up that bill. I now move to take from the table the bill (H. R. No. 793) to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, and that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 793) to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates.

The first section provides that hereafter the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates shall be at the rate of $6,000 per annum, payable monthly, and in addition thereto the actual individual expenses of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in going to and returning from the seat of Government once in each session, to be certified in writing by each.

The second section provides that the compensation of the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall be at the rate of $2,000 in addition to his pay as Representative, amounting in all to $8,000; and that of the Vice-President shall be the same amount, with the same allowance for traveling expenses as before provided.

Section three repeals all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of the act.

Section four requires the Secretary of the Treasury to cover into the Treasury all sums that may remain undrawn, or which have been received as increased compensation under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1873, and which shall have or may come into his possession by the return thereof.

The Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment reported an amendment, to strike out the first, second, and third sections of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874," as provides for the increase of the compensation of members of Congress and the several officers and employés of either House of Congress, or both, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the salaries and compensation of all said persons shall be as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of said act.

SEC. 2. That the compensation of the several heads of Departments shall be each $8,000 per annum.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to call attention to an omission which I have no doubt occurred by oversight. The word "Delegates" should be inserted, so as to read "Members of Congress and Delegates." Delegates are not technically members of Congress.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suppose there can be no objection to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. In line 6, of the first section, the words "and Delegates" should be added.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to amend the amendment reported by the committee by inserting the words "and Delegates" in the place indicated.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee, as amended.

Mr. SCHURZ. I would ask the Senator from Iowa whether this amendment, which I may say by the way I have read to-day for the first time, which undoubtedly is my fault, is to be so construed as to oblige members of the Forty-third Congress, who have already drawn salary at the enhanced rate provided for by the law of the last Congress, to refund the excess so drawn, or whether it is to be deducted from the aggregate compensation for the two years. If not, I shall, if nobody else does, introduce an amendment to that effect.

Mr. WRIGHT. My understanding of the bill as it stands is, that it takes the compensation allowed Senators and Representatives prior to the passage of the so-called increased-salary bill from this date, but that so far as salaries have been drawn since the 4th of March last they remain untouched by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SCHURZ. Then I desire to offer an amendment to reach the object which I have stated.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand the Senator from Indiana to state that the bill has the effect indicated by the Senator from Missouri now.

Mr. SCHURZ. No; that it has not.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I suppose that all of us feel like acting on this bill promptly and with very little debate, and therefore I shall not introduce any discussion; but it is manifest that the committee that reported this bill acted on the idea that they would restore things to the precise condition they were on the 3d of March, 1873, when the salary bill was passed.

The provision reported by this committee simply restores after the passage of this act the salaries of Congressmen which were in existence on the 3d of March, and not only salaries, but mileage and all the then existing provisions of law in regard to the compensation and pay of members of Congress and the employés of the respective Houses. This is a full repeal of the act referred to of March 3, except as to two or three particulars; and, first, as to the President of the United States. There the committee was met by the plain constitutional provision, which declares that the salary of the President shall not be increased nor diminished during his term of office, and no Senator felt called upon to violate his oath by attempting to do what the Constitution forbade him to do. And the same observation may be made in regard to the judges of the Supreme Court.

This bill as amended includes members of the Cabinet, so as to restore the compensation of all the officers of the Government, except the President and judges of the Supreme Court, to the precise condition it was on the 3d of March last.

I do not intend to say one word as to our previous action on this matter, because that would only invite controversy and debate; but I do believe that a fixed public opinion, when fairly ascertained, should be obeyed by Congress. We are but the representatives of the people of the United States, and upon the question of this salary bill there is no doubt but that there is a general sentiment throughout the United States that the salary ought to be restored at least to its former level. I am not ashamed to say, whatever may have been my opinion, that I am willing to obey this voice. Indeed, I may say for myself that I do not change my opinion in this particular; but even if I believed that the salaries of members of Congress ought to be $7,500, if I believed that the passage of that law was wise, I do think that, in just deference to the opinion of those who sent us here, the salaries ought to be restored, and it is no act of humiliation for every member of Congress to join in such a bill.

There is great dissatisfaction with the bill that has been sent to us from the House of Representatives. It does seem to me the best thing, the most graceful thing, the fairest thing to be done is simply to restore the law to where it was before the act of March 3, 1873. It is true this restores an inequality as to mileage, but that is a subject which may be dealt with hereafter if necessary. I shall vote for this amendment with great pleasure, and I hope the bill will pass without much controversy.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, this subject has been discussed so much in and out of Congress that I have little hope of saying anything new. The single thing we seek to accomplish in the measure under consideration is to fix our compensation and that of the Presiding Officers upon a just basis. We have the House bill and the substitute reported by the committee before us to choose between. Though in form a general law, we cannot, if we would, tie the hands of a future Congress. Each one will judge for itself what shall be the measure of its compensation.

All that is said in the Constitution upon the subject is found in the sixth section of the first article:

The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law and paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Two things are here plainly recognized—that members of Congress unlike members of the British Parliament, shall be paid for their services; and next, that they shall ascertain for themselves what their services are worth; thus allowing them to legislate in their own interest.

Each Congress may, therefore, fix its own rate of compensation.

Another thing is plain, and that is that this compensation may be fixed at any session of a particular Congress. It does not violate the Constitution, therefore, to fix it on the last day of the last session. The power is a general one, running through the entire Congress and only expiring when it expires.

The life of a Congress continues for two years. That is the term for which Representatives are elected. Though a perpetual body in legal contemplation, it is wholly recruited in one branch every two years, and in the other every six.

During this entire term of two years the power of Congress is exactly equal.

I make these observations in the outset, because it has been often assumed that the last Congress exceeded its power in fixing the salary of its members on the last day of the last session.

Objectionable as the law is on other grounds, which I shall endeavor to point out, there cannot, in my judgment, be any doubt on the mere question of power to fix the compensation at the time it was done.

While some reasons may be given for fixing it at the close of a Congress, more and better ones favor the settlement of this question at an early day, in order that the people, the ultimate tribunal, may have time to protest if it be fixed too high.

Mr. President, I have been at some pains to examine the legislation of Congress upon the subject of the compensation of its members from the beginning of the Government, and I will state the result as briefly as possible.

The first Congress under the Constitution met in the city of New York on the 4th of March, 1789. That Congress held three sessions. The first, beginning on the 4th of March, continued to the 29th of September, 1789. The very first legislation on the subject of the compensation of the members took place on the 22d of September, within a week of the adjournment. As is well known, the policy in that early day was to make per-diem allowances, as is the case in the State Legislatures at the present day. Congress on that day fixed the compensation of Senators and Representatives at six dollars per day for every day of attendance, and six dollars mileage for every twenty miles of the estimated distance by the most usual road from the member's place of residence to the seat of Congress. The mileage, amounting to thirty cents a mile, was to be paid at the commencement and end of every session. This first law upon the subject was, by its terms, to continue in force until the 4th of March, 1796, and no longer.

There is, however, in this law a curious provision, applicable to the Senate alone, by which it is provided that at every session of Congress, and at every meeting of the Senate in the recess, after the 4th of March, 1795, Senators shall receive seven dollars per day and mileage at the rate of seven dollars for every twenty miles of travel, or thirty-five cents a mile. No similar provision is made for members of the House of Representatives. The whole act, as I have said, was to expire on the 4th of March, 1796.

No further legislation occurred until the Fourth Congress. The first session met in Philadelphia on the 7th of December, 1795, and ended on the 1st of January, 1796.

On the 10th of March, 1796, after a session of three months, the second act fixing the compensation of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives was passed; and here again a uniform rate of six dollars per day for each Senator and Representative, and a mileage rate of six dollars for every twenty miles of travel, was established, without any limitation as to the period it should continue. The mileage was to be paid as before, at the commencement and end of every session, thirty cents per mile, by the most usual road.

The first occasion for making provision for the compensation and mileage of delegates to Congress occurred on the 18th day of February, 1802, when they were put upon the same footing with members of Congress.

From 1796 to 1816 no change was made in the rate, and the compensation, as it was fixed in the beginning, continued a per-diem allowance.

But a new rule was inaugurated in the Fourteenth Congress. The first session met on the 4th of December, 1815, and ended on the 30th of April, 1816. This, it will be remembered, was immediately after the conclusion of the war with Great Britain—a period of great depression in the country. On the 19th of March, 1816, Congress fixed the pay of each Senator and member of Congress at an annual salary of $1,500, making a stringent provision for a deduction for absenteeism except in case of sickness. Though nothing is said on the subject of mileage in this act, it was obviously continued in force, since the only change attempted or professed was the substitution of a salary for a per-diem compensation.

But the Fifteenth Congress overthrew this rule and returned to the per-diem allowance. The first session of that Congress met on the 1st of December, 1817, and ended on the 20th of April following. On the 22d day of January, 1818, an act was passed fixing the compensation at eight dollars per day for both Houses, to reach back to the 3d of March, 1817, and fixing the mileage at eight dollars for every twenty miles, or forty cents a mile. You will observe, sir, that this act was retroactive, and decreased the rate of compensation for a period of over ten months.

There was no further legislation deserving special notice until the Thirty-fourth Congress.

The first session convened on the 3d of December, 1855, and adjourned on the 18th of August, 1856.

I desire now to call the attention of the Senate specially to the act which passed on the 16th day of August, and only two days before the adjournment, since it contains the very features so objectionable in the law as it now exists.

The compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress is fixed at $6,000 for each Congress, or $3,000 a year, and mileage, as then fixed by law, which, you will remember, was eight dollars for every twenty miles.

This law considerably increased the previous compensation and related back to the beginning of the session—a period of near eight months—providing, however, that what had been received under the old law should be deducted.

It seems that there was some doubt about the question of mileage, however, and as to how the salary should be paid, for on the 28th day of December, 1857, a joint resolution was passed which provided that the mileage should be paid at the beginning of every session, and the salary, at the rate of $250 per month, should be paid at the end of every month; and at the beginning of the second, or any subsequent session, the salary which had accrued during the adjournment should be paid to the member.

Nearly eleven years later, at the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress, and on the 28th of July, 1866, the rule was again changed. That Congress assembled on the 4th of December, 1865, and the first session ended on the 28th of July following. It was, therefore, on the last day of the session, and nearly eight months from its commencement, that the legislation I am about to state took place.

The act is a short one, and constitutes the seventeenth section of the civil-service appropriation bill; and is as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, shall be $5,000 per annum, to be computed from the first day of the present Congress, and in addition thereto mileage, at the rate of twenty cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to, and returning from, each regular session; but nothing herein contained shall affect mileage accounts already accrued under existing laws: Provided, That hereafter mileage accounts of Senators shall be certified by the President of the Senate, and those of Representatives and Delegates by the Speaker of the House of Representatives: And provided further, That the pay of the Speaker shall be $8,000 per annum.

I desire to call attention to two things in this law. While the rate as to mileage is established at four dollars for every twenty miles of travel, yet those who, at the beginning of the session, received it at the rate of eight dollars are allowed to retain it; and next, the increase of the salary at the rate of $2,000 a year is made to relate back to the beginning of the Congress, a period of more than sixteen and three-fourths months. This gave each member of Congress back pay to the amount of $166.66 for each month, amounting for sixteen and three-fourths months to $2,800 over that to which he had been entitled under the law which was in force while the service was performed. More than that, the old law, which was condemned as to the salary, was accepted as to the mileage which had accrued under it—forty cents a mile, admitted by the new law to be extravagant in being cut down one-half.

To say that this law did not attract attention at the time and provoke some criticism would not be true. But it was not generally condemned, for two reasons. In the first place, it dispensed with the odious rate as to mileage, cutting the rate down one-half; and, in the next place, our currency was in a depreciated condition, and the salary established, $5,000 per year, was not believed to be more, in fact, than $3,000 before the war, in its purchasing power. The premium on gold on the day the law took effect was 150; that is to say, $150 in currency was worth only $100 in gold; and by that rule $5,000 in currency was worth only $3,333.33 in gold.

Thus stood the rule of compensation, universally acquiesced in, so far as I know, as fair and just, until the 3d of March, 1873. It was then changed, and in a manner fresh within all of our recollections. So that members of Congress are now drawing a salary, and have been since that time, at the rate of $7,500 per year and actual traveling expenses. The law was made to relate back, in its increase, to the beginning of that Congress—a period of two years—so as to give each member of the Forty-second Congress $5,000 in excess of the salary provided by the law in force during that entire Congress up to March 3, 1873. It is true, however, that this excess was in many cases more nominal than real, for it was provided that in settling the pay and allowances of members of the Forty-second Congress all mileage should be deducted and no allowance made for expenses of travel; and it was further provided that the salary given should be in lieu of all pay and allowances except actual individual traveling expenses, by the most direct route of usual travel, once for each session.

The operation of this law is well illustrated in the case of those living most distant from the seat of government. If the distance were three thousand miles, $2,400, the mileage actually paid for two sessions, would be deducted from the $15,000, leaving the actual salary paid for the two years $15,000, diminished by $2,400 and by the amount allowed and received during that Congress for stationery.

When this last rule of compensation was established gold was at a premium of 15 per cent., so that the salary allowed, $7,500, payable in currency, was on that day worth in gold $6,375, or nearly double the value in gold of the salary provided under the law of 1866.

I have thus, Mr. President, briefly as I could, stated all our legislation from the beginning upon this subject; and the practical question is, what shall be the rule of compensation for the future?

It is conceded that we must abolish the law of March last if we pretend to pay any respect to public opinion. Since we left here last spring no act of Congress passed within my recollection has been more generally criticised, I should rather say denounced. In every form in which public sentiment finds expression in this country—in the newspaper press, on the stump, in political and other conventions, county, district, and State, and by men of all shades of political opinion—the law has been condemned and its repeal demanded. We are here as the representatives of the people of the States to give the form of law to public opinion, where it is well informed and comes to us well authenticated. And, sir, as I interpret the various manifestations we have had of the opinion of the people on this subject, it is their sober second thought, their deliberate judgment, after the question has been amply debated and every reason urged by the defenders of the law calmly considered, that Congress erred in this matter, and should make haste to retrace its steps and correct the wrong so far as it is possible to do it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Senator from Indiana will suspend his remarks. The morning hour has expired, and the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance is before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the Senator from Indiana will be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. PRATT. I shall be through in ten minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the Senator from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. PRATT. It is well known now that as an independant measure, standing by itself, this law could never have been passed. It was hitched upon an appropriation bill, and was considered in the closing hours of Congress, and many, without doubt, voted for the bill containing this obnoxious provision rather than that the whole bill, freighted with appropriations amounting to many millions, should fail, and thus an extra session of Congress become necessary to make the needed appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government. Such was the cunning device of those who sought this increase of pay.

I repeat, sir, the fair, manly way to have accomplished this increase, if to be done at all, was the one followed from the beginning of the Government down to 1866, by an act single in its purpose and bold in its announcement, usually reading like that of 1856: "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress."

For the second time in our history—and I sincerely hope the last—this objectionable law was fastened upon the country by legislative finesse, borrowing its aid for support from the general merits of the bill to which it was attached, when it could not have stood alone.

The President has forcibly called our attention to this objectionable mode of law-making, and has thought it worthy of Congress to propose a constitutional amendment to prevent it in the future.

Now, sir, since all are agreed the law must be changed, the only real question to be discussed is, what is a fair measure of compensation? On this point we differ, and are likely to differ, unless we choose to defer to the popular judgment. I embraced what I thought to be that judgment in the bill I introduced on the first day of the session, and which I intend to offer as a substitute for that reported by the committee. The House bill, as it came over to us, fixed the compensation at $6,000 per year and actual traveling expenses. The bill reported by the committee as a substitute restores the old compensation, $5,000 per year, and the old mileage. Neither of these bills compels the return of the excess above $6,000 in the one case and $5,000 in the other paid to members since the 4th of March last. This excess amounts to $208.34 per month, rating the salary at $5,000; or for the ten months which have elapsed, in round numbers, to $2,083. My bill contemplates the return of this by an equal deduction every month on the pay-roll, so that at the end of the Forty-third Congress no member will have received in the aggregate more than $5,000 per year, or $10,000 for the Congress.

Mr. President, it seems to me the question as to this excess is yielded in now fixing the salary at $5,000. Why do we abate from the $7,500 salary at all? Is it not because public opinion has settled that this is too much; and if too much now, it was too much when the law was passed, and has been too much every day since.

I insist, therefore, that to be consistent we should make the law relate back to the 4th of March. If on every increase of salary heretofore it has been right to make the law relate back to the first day of the Congress which made the increase—and that has been the practice without exception—why should not the same principle apply when the salary is to be graded down? Why should not the decrease be governed by the same rule as the increase, and find its support in the same reasons? It seems to me the argument would be unanswerable if we could forget that we have received and spent the money.

For one, sir, I always thought that the old salary, that established by the law of 1866, was ample. It had stood upon the statute-book for nearly seven years, and had come to be recognized as the permanent rule on the subject. No one seeking a seat in Congress had ever thought it prudent to agitate the question of an increase of pay. Because of this silence, this acquiescence, as strongly implied as if actually expressed, the people, in electing members to Congress, considered there was a compact that they would serve their constituents during the term for which they were chosen at the compensation as it was then established.

To be sure, sir, there was no such compact in law, nor any express understanding on the subject; but the people regard it otherwise, and there is some color for their argument in the fact that no public man, no candidate for congressional honors, ever proposed to change the law previous to the Forty-second Congress.

But I was speaking of the sufficiency of the salary, and wish to submit a few words on that subject with great deference to the opinion of others who think differently.

In my judgment it was adequate to meet the expenses of the great majority of members of Congress and leave a surplus. Some—many, I dare say—lived beyond their salary, as it was their right to do, and they had the means of doing. It would have been so had the salary been double. I do not stand here to criticise any man's style of living. Each one must judge for himself what duty his official position imposes as to his manner of life, the scale of his hospitality, the costliness of his house, furniture, and equipage, during the few months in the discharge he remains in the capital to discharge his duties and trusts as the servant of the people; never forgetting he has been sent here to look after their interests and honor, and not to promote his own aggrandizement or selfish gratification:—I say each man must judge for himself whether he is here to be a luminary of fashion or to work.

Sir, if it be not unfashionable to say so here, I think something—nay, a good deal—is due to the character of our constituencies, to their habits and mode of life, to the economies which a stern necessity enforces them to practice, to the heavy burdens which Government lays on their shoulders, when we are discussing this question. Why, sir, I venture the assertion that what we pay ourselves, putting it at the lowest figure named, would support five average families the country over.

More, much more, is due to the republican character of our institutions. This was meant to be a plain government. It was instituted by a plain people—not for gaudy show, but to advance their interests. Our forefathers had had enough of royalty and titles and the expenses of a kingly government. They cut loose from all these and instituted a government of the people. The mass of the people now, as then, are not rich. It is a constant struggle with them to live comfortably and decently and keep out of debt. With all possible economy they cannot always make their ends meet. There is a great deal of indebtedness in the country. Men are being sold out of house and home every day. In the large cities crowds of men are besieging the city governments to give them work. Their cry is, "work or bread."

These are the people, sir, we represent, and for whom we are speaking on this question. Every wail of distress that comes up to this Capitol admonishes us to economy, and to set an example of it in our own persons. Whatever we vote into our pockets is to come from the harassed tax-payers.

But, sir, as $5,000 a year is amply adequate as a salary, so it is greatly in excess of what is paid generally throughout the country for skilled labor.

Do you doubt this? Let me institute comparisons. Let me begin with the learned professions, so called—the medical profession, the pulpit, and the bar. Not one in five hundred of the average men of these professions commands as high pay as $5,000 a year. So with the educators in our schools, our academies, colleges, and universities. So with the skilled men managing the affairs of the great corporations of the country—the banks, insurance companies, and railroads. So with the skilled mechanics, who are building the cities and the wonderful labor-saving machinery of the country.

There are particular positions, I grant you, where the pay is higher. There are exceptional men in the pulpit, with wealthy congregations, that get more. There are lawyers of great eminence in the large cities who make five times as much by their practice. But I am not talking of exceptional cases, but stating a general rule; and my proposition is that Congressmen at salaries of $5,000 a year are better paid than nine-tenths of the most learned and skillful men in other fields of labor. More especially is this true when you take into account the long vacations of Congress. Why, sir, it is only a little upward of a month since we assembled here after spending a vacation at home of more than eight months, employing our time in travel, amusement, or business, as we saw proper; and we have just reassembled after another vacation of about two weeks in which to celebrate the holidays.

But beyond all this, sir, I believe it to be true that the old compensation paid, and which the bill reported by the committee restores, is in excess of what the great majority of Congressmen could earn at home or ever did. I may err in this, but such is my belief. Looking at the present condition of our currency, $5,000 a year is equivalent to about $4,500 in gold—a rate of compensation nearly or quite three times as great as was paid to members of Congress before the year 1856, and greater by one-third than the salary at that time established. Nay, more: its gold value to-day is greater by more than $1,000 than it was in 1866, when $5,000 a year was first established as the salary of members of Congress.

But there is another consideration which has great weight with me in advocating this reduction—I mean the immense indebtedness of the country and the necessity for the greatest possible retrenchment and economy in order to maintain the public credit—defray the necessary current expenses of the Government, and make the burdens of taxation bearable. They who pay the taxes have the right to demand, and do demand, that we practice economy—a close, rigid economy. Who are we, sir, who lay these taxes and direct their expenditure, but trustees for the time being? What is the money in the Treasury but a trust fund upon which we are administering? Now, sir, since the Constitution has referred this question to us—and to us alone—to settle for ourselves, does not every consideration of honor and good faith, nay, of common honesty, require that we should do for ourselves and by ourselves what we would do for others; or, rather, to state the proposition in other words, are we not put upon our good behavior and required to observe a greater moderation in dealing with ourselves than if we were prescribing compensation for others? Let no one reply to this that if we are generous to ourselves we are to those who shall fill our seats in future Congresses; that the rule is not one for to-day simply, but for all time. No, sir; that sophistry will blind no one. We cannot tie the hands of our successors, or bind them to accept a law giving them unjust compensation. Each Congress will be the keeper of its own conscience.

I appeal to my professional brethren on this floor to bear me out in the view I am urging. I present the question in a form familiar to you all. You have had clients who trusted in your honor. They had great interests at stake, and needed your services. They did not stop to higgle with you about the fee. You made no bargain with them, and you were free to put your own price upon your services. Well, the case was tried, and your confiding client called upon you to settle the bill. Tell me, is it not true that the man's confidence in your justice and in your honor moderated your charges; did he not get off better than had he cautiously bargained with you in advance? I need not, sir, look very deep into the human heart to tell why this is so. But it illustrates the principle that should govern us in fixing our compensation, when the whole matter is in our own hands and conscience is the only arbiter.

There is yet another view, Mr. President, which I urge against the bill reported by the committee, if it is designed to establish a permanent rule on the subject. It is this: We fix our compensation in the future at $5,000 a year. We do more. We make it the permanent rule so far as we can. It will be the permanent rule, unless some future Congress shall repeal it. Yet we, who institute this rule and place it on the statute-book as a just and permanent one, have been for ten months in the receipt of a compensation higher by one-third!

Am I not right, sir, in saying that we yield up every pretense of right to hold on to the salary we have been receiving, when we fix for the future for ourselves a lower salary? Is there any pretense that it costs us less to live now than formerly? Has there been a great fall in prices here at the capital since the 4th of March last, that we can thus drop down one-third in our pay? No, sir; no one pretends that. No one will vote for this reduction or any other reduction for any such reason. We shall reduce the pay because some of us who voted against the increase think that reduction is just and proper; others will vote it because the people, our masters, have willed that we should; because that will has been manifested in so many forms, for so many consecutive months, and comes to us so well authenticated, so stamped as the final and irreversible judgment of the people, that we are left without excuse for not obeying it.

But, sir, in one respect that will, though so strongly expressed, is not capable of being carried into effect. The popular idea is that we can compel restitution from the members of the Forty-second Congress of the back pay. But that is impossible. Many of them are not here, and we could not reach them by our legislation. But were they here the thing could not be done. What they received was in pursuance of a law on the statute-book. It was an unwise law I grant; but it was still the law, and no one can doubt that Congress had the power to pass it who will take the trouble to look into the Constitution. When the money was paid and received under that law, there is no power in Congress or the courts to compel restitution, though we repeal the law a hundred times.

But the case is entirely different, sir, in fixing the pay of the members of the present Congress. That matter is wholly in our power. We could abolish it entirely, or do what my bill accomplishes, reduce our compensation in the future so that when this Congress shall come to an end on the 3d of March, 1875, our entire pay shall have averaged but $5,000 a year.

There is one other feature in the bill reported by the Committee to which I object. It revives the old, obnoxious, unjust, and condemned system of mileage, giving twenty cents a mile, or four dollars for every twenty miles of travel, in addition to the salary. There never was any justice or equality in this since the day of travel by steamboats and railways. The true rule was stated in the act we are repealing, and is the one redeeming feature in that obnoxious law; and that is actual individual traveling expenses. Why any other rule should ever have been thought of is hard to imagine. Its unjust discrimination has been pointed out a thousand times, and I shall not dwell on it. I will say, however, there are members here who dwell within one hundred miles of this Capitol and less. This bill will pay them for one mileage coming here twenty dollars, while my friend from Oregon, who lives four thousand miles and more from here, will receive for one mileage $800, or $3,200 for one Congress, while the actual traveling expenses in either case will not amount to half the sum, no, not the third.

Mr. President, in concluding what I have to say on this question, I desire to observe that I have avoided making any reference to individual action in the passage of the salary bill. While I think it was a great mistake, I impeach no man's motive in voting for it. It is enough for me to know that no one violated the Constitution who supported it, and every one had the right to judge for himself what was a just measure of his compensation. But the question has assumed quite a different aspect now. We are here to represent the people truly and honestly, at personal sacrifice if necessary. And they have spoken upon this question and demanded a return to the old salary. As honorable men, I submit we should obey their voice or cease to be their representatives.

Mr. President, I had intended when I rose to offer the bill which I introduced on the first day of the present session as a substitute to the pending bill; but upon reading the bill—I never had an opportunity of reading it until this morning—I discovered that my end can be attained sufficiently by this amendment, which will come in at the termination of the third section, and which embraces, as I understand, the proposition of the Senator from Missouri. I will read it for his information:

Provided, however, That the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-third Congress who have received their compensation since the 4th day of March, 1873, at the rate of $7,500 per year, in accordance with the act of March 3, 1873, shall hereafter be paid only such monthly installments as shall in the aggregate make their compensation for the whole Congress equal to the sum of $5,000 per year.

Does that accomplish the end of my friend from Missouri?

Mr. SCHURZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRATT. Then I offer this as an amendment to the bill reported by the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Chair will state that the Senator from Indiana has been occupying the time since the expiration of the morning hour by common consent. The question now before the Senate is the resolution reported by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. SHERMAN,] upon which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope that resolution will be laid aside informally until this matter is disposed of.

Mr. BOGY. I prefer to go on now. This subject will, no doubt, be much discussed, and it cannot be disposed of this morning.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think it can be.

Mr. BOGY. I think it would be as well for me to go on. The pending bill will involve a great deal of discussion and cannot be disposed of this morning.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I feel very confident that the subject will not require very much time. I do not think there is any disposition on the part of the Senate to discuss it. I believe it is conceded on all sides that a vote is better than the very best speech.

Mr. BOGY. I would prefer not to yield. There are Senators on this side of the Chamber, and perhaps on the other side, who I know desire to discuss the question, and it cannot be disposed of this morning.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust the Senator from Missouri will consent to allow us to proceed with the consideration of this bill. I feel very certain that there is no disposition to debate it on this side of the Chamber, nor am I aware of a disposition to debate it anywhere. I think we can get a vote on the several amendments, if there be any, without discussion.

Mr. BOGY. As I have said, I prefer to go on, feeling satisfied that this subject cannot be disposed of this morning.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I simply wish to remark, that I desire to submit a few observations on this subject before the bill is disposed of. I do not think it can be disposed of this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri insists on his right to the floor. The resolution reported by the Committee on Finance is before the Senate, and the Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

SPECIE PAYMENTS—THE CURRENCY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, reported by Mr. SHERMAN from the Committee on Finance on the 10th of December last:

Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress, during its present session, to adopt definite measures to redeem the pledge made in the act approved March 18, 1869, entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," as follows: "And the United States also pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin;" and the Committee on Finance is directed to report to the Senate, at as early a day as practicable, such measures as will not only redeem this pledge of the public faith, but will also furnish a currency of uniform value, always redeemable in gold or its equivalent, and so adjusted as to meet the changing wants of trade and commerce.

Mr. BOGY said: Mr. President, a controlling sense of duty to the State I have the honor in part to represent on this floor compels me to say a few words on the absorbing question before this body, and which at this moment is also engaging the attention of the whole nation. The entire country is suffering; but my State—and if I may be allowed to speak for the West I can say that that entire section is suffering—infinitely more than the East. With us the panic is not yet over, and, in my opinion, will never be over unless the present financial system of the Government is entirely changed. We think that our pecuniary troubles, in their entirety, are forced on us by a vicious system of finance, existing under the sanction and by virtue of the legislation of Congress. To remodel this system so as to afford the relief which we need is a work which certainly calls for the highest abilities. That this can be done in a day, or even in a short time, may be impossible; but that this relief can be speedily afforded, while a more perfect system is being elaborated by the able and experienced members of this body, I sincerely believe. The subject, therefore, divides itself into two very distinct propositions. First, speedy relief; secondly, a more perfect system, based on true principles of finance. I say based on true principles of finance, for no system will answer to the wants of this great producing, manufacturing, and commercial country, which is in conflict with and in direct contradiction to the experience of mankind in all ages and the well-known opinions of the enlightened men of the world.

The first proposition is "speedy relief." How is this most important object to be effected? I see no way how this can be so well and speedily done as by the issuing of additional currency in the way I will hereafter indicate. The act authorizing the issue of legal-tender notes provided for $400,000,000. In addition to this, we had in 1870 3 per cent. certificates, amounting in round numbers to $45,000,000. These certificates were used in commercial transactions, and practically added that much to the circulation of the country. By their withdrawal, and the withdrawal of the $44,000,000 reserve, a sum equal to $90,000,000 was withdrawn from circulation. This, of itself, was calculated to derange the business of the entire country. A part of the reserve has already been used for the daily expenses of the Government, and the balance may, with a decreasing revenue, be needed for the same purpose. This being the case, an increase of legal-tender notes, say fifty millions in amount, should be authorized. This sum should be invested in the purchase of the five-twenty bonds now due, or, if preferred, in bonds at current rates for legal-tenders. And so as to avoid concentration at one point the purchase should be made in the different cities where an assistant treasurer is located. This would add to the circulation at once an amount which, being properly distributed in the West as well as in the East, would give sufficient strength to the banks throughout the country to discount legitimate business paper liberally.

I know that the objection will be raised that this would immediately put gold up, which is not desirable; but this objection I obviate, as I will show hereafter. This, if done soon, and indeed immediately, would afford the relief so much needed, particularly by my section of the country, and enable the great crops of the West and of the South to move on to market. This measure I propose as only a temporary one, and it is forced on us by the pressing exigencies growing out of the late panic—for I look upon the whole system of legal-tenders as vicious and in conflict with the laws of finance, as recognized throughout the civilized world and sanctioned by time and experience. But the wants of the country, and particularly of my section, are so pressing as not to allow us time to do anything better just now.

I have read with care the speeches made on this floor and the different propositions which have been presented, and I cannot see any speedy relief in any of them. Speedy relief is what the country needs. The cereal crop, the meat crop, and the cotton crop, are all waiting to be moved; or if moved under the present pressure, it will be done at ruinously low prices. And while the foreign demand is greater this year than at any time before, it will do us, the producers and raisers of these crops, no good. The middle-men of means in the large cities, like New York, will take advantage of our wants and buy our products at the lowest figure, and sell to the foreigner at the enhanced price caused by the great demand abroad. Hence, I urge that something be done speedily; and if any other proposition can better effect this most important object I will most cheerfully give it my support.

The West has raised this year a very large crop; so has the South. Yet in my State we are in actual distress for the want of money, and many of our people, who are in good circumstances as to property, will be unable to pay their taxes. For, as was well said by the Senator from Massachusetts a few days ago, while we are selling our products at prices lower than they were before the war, we are paying from 25 to 50 per cent. more for all the manufactured articles that come to us from the East; and it is only a question of time, and that not long, when we will be unable to buy the manufactures of the East; and if all my constituents were like me, I would lay an embargo on all manufactured articles from that section, and make our own plows and pitchforks, our shoes and hats, even if they had to be the old Indian moccasin and the coon-skin caps. That we will be driven to this unless we can get reasonable prices for our products is beyond all doubt, and, as I said before, is only a question of time. There is hardly a town in my State which is really prosperous and is growing; and yet I believe it to be the richest State of the Mississippi Valley, having good soil, good climate, vast and various minerals, and large water-courses, with an intelligent, and, if the means existed, enterprising people. Yet I repeat, in concluding this branch of my argument, we will be ruined unless speedy relief is given us.

In presenting my views on the second branch of my argument, I candidly confess that I am embarrassed with the magnitude and intricacies of the subject. A good system of finance lies at the very foundation of all commercial prosperity, and is the only means which enables nations to transact business with the world. Can a system of this kind be inaugurated by us? Is the present one—born during the war, and for that period most admirable—such a one as will give us commercial prosperity, and enable the energetic merchants of this nation to meet their rivals in all markets on equal terms? I say it is not. It is not competent for a government to say in advance, "You need one or two hundred million dollars, or four or eight hundred million dollars." This may be too much, or it may be too little. The laws of commerce must govern this—the law of demand and supply; with too much money (calling paper money for the sake of the argument) prices are inflated and speculation engendered, and ruin and disaster very soon the result. With too little, times are hard, money scarce, enterprise checked, and poverty of the masses the result, while a few money lenders get very rich.

At this present age of extended commerce banks have become a necessity, and no nation can exist as a commercial nation without good banks. This point need not be argued. We have had three different systems in this country—State banks of circulation, a United States bank with branches in the different States, and recently the national-bank system. Of these three different systems I freely recognize the national-bank the best, and if perfected, as I humbly believe it can be, the best system yet devised by the wit of man. To make the credit of a nation the basis of a banking system, in which all are interested, is worthy of our age, and I will also say worthy of our country, for it is an American invention. For while I will not admit the correctness of the proposition that a national debt is a public blessing, yet it is a singular fact that a blessing can be extorted from it while it does continue to exist. Our debt is a fixed fact; our bonds are outstanding, and must be held by somebody, and the nation has to pay the interest; and this will continue during at least our generation. To use these bonds as a security to the note-holders, these holders being the people themselves, the tax-payers of the entire nation, is truly a grand idea. For of all the terrible curses that can afflict the laboring man, a bad and irredeemable paper currency is the very worst. Yet this system, good as it may be in principle, can be used to build up one section and destroy another; and this is the fact at the present time, as I will now undertake to show.

The national-bank system was created by the act of 25th February, 1863; and under this act and the subsequent acts of the 3d June, 1864, and 3d March, 1865, the amount of $300,000,000 of circulating notes was authorized; and under the last-named act one-half of this amount was to be apportioned according to representation, and the other half among associations formed in different sections, having regard to existing banking capital, resources, and business of each State. The $300,000,000 of circulation were not, however, distributed in accordance with the act of the 3d of March, 1865, because, contemporary with its passage, an amendment to the internal-revenue law (of 30th June, 1864) was passed, providing that the circulation of State banks should be taxed 10 per cent. after the 1st July, 1866. But a subsequent section gave to the banks already in existence the preference in becoming national banks. Under this provision the banks which had been taxed out of existence generally applied for authority to organize as national banks, and the result was that banks in the Eastern and Middle States obtained a large amount in excess of what they were entitled to under the law of apportionment.

To remedy this inequality the act of July 12, 1870, was passed, for an additional issue of circulating notes amounting to $54,000,000, to be distributed among those States having less than their proportion; and it also required the cancellation of the 3 per cent. certificates to an amount equal to the circulation issued, and a new apportionment on the basis of the census of 1870 was prescribed.

At the outset the Eastern States received $94,000,000 more than their share under the act providing for a distribution of the money on the basis of population and wealth. The final distribution of the $54,000,000 will still leave a deficiency of $40,000,000, which will require to be filled before the proportion among the different States will be equalized upon this basis of wealth and population.

Section 6 of the act of July, 1870, provides, that after the whole $54,000,000 of circulation shall have been distributed, $25,000,000 shall be withdrawn from States having an excess, and distributed among States having less than their just proportion.

I have been thus careful, Mr. President, in giving a clear, succinct, and perfectly correct history (taken from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency) of the beginning, progress, mode of distribution, and sections where distributed, so that the Senate and the country may see and understand how and why it is that, however hard our farmers and planters may work and toil, however genial and fruitful the season may have been, however plentiful and refreshing the rains may have fallen on the fruitful soil of the West and of the South, prosperity for the want of money was, and is to-day, an impossibility.

Again, Mr. President, so that these facts may go to the country, and that the newspapers of my section at least should be able to lay them before the minds of the people, I will detain the Senate by giving the following brief statement of the exact and official figures of the distribution of this money:

States.	Amount entitled to.	Amount received.	Excess.
Maine	$4,931,018 00	$8,029,252 00	$3,098,234 00
New Hampshire	2,947,938 00	4,624,525 00	1,676,587 00
Vermont	2,897,976 00	6,932,030 00	4,034,054 00
Massachusetts	19,239,189 00	59,523,671 00	40,284,482 00
Rhode Island	2,750,047 00	13,385,840 00	10,635,793 00
Connecticut	7,033,752 00	17,994,648 00	10,690,896 00
	39,799,920 00	110,489,966 00	70,690,046 00

The six New England States received an excess, which they have to this day, of upward of $70,000,000.

New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland received an excess of upward of $9,000,000.

The so-called Southern States, namely: Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri, received less than their proportion a sum exceeding $51,000,000.

The Western States, namely: Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, and Nebraska, received less than their share a sum exceeding $21,000,000.

This great preponderance in favor of the East was caused by the amendment to the revenue law which imposed a tax of 10 per cent. on the circulation of the State banks, thus driving them out of existence as banks of circulation, and because of a compensatory preference given to them in the organization of national banks. The New England States and the Middle States had many banks with very large banking capital, while the South and West had but few and very small banking capital. In this way the Eastern States, having the State banks, had first to be supplied; the South and West when they applied found the amount left for them to be truly very small. Therefore, while money has been abundant in the East, and that section consequently very prosperous, in the West it has been, and is to-day, very scarce, and consequently this section is really very far from being prosperous.

I wish it, Mr. President, distinctly understood, that in grouping these figures, and showing the facts which I have shown, I do it in no sectional feeling or invidious spirit. Nor do I say that the East has more money than its energy, its great manufacturing establishments, and its intelligence demand. My object is to show that the West, the entire West, needs relief, and that speedily.

This relief can be afforded, I think, in the way I have already stated; namely, the immediate issue of the reserve of $44,000,000; but as this may be needed by the Government to supply its own necessities, the sum of $50,000,000 should be immediately issued in legal-tenders, and invested in the purchase of bonds. In addition, the $25,000,000 provided for by the act of the 12th July, 1870, should be at once issued to western national banks in accordance with the law.

I know it may be said that the West, having failed to absorb the $54,000,000, has no just claim to the $25,000,000. To this there is this answer: the entire $54,000,000 have long since been promised to existing banks; but which, for reasons peculiar to the banks, have not been called for. Yet if the question had been left open for new banks I know that the whole amount would long since have been absorbed. Under the present system it is impossible to organize a bank of issue, unless it is a national bank; and as the maximum authorized is already issued, the consequence is, however much we may need additional banking facilities, we cannot get them.

Much might be said on the subject of reserves. It seems to me that no reserve is necessary to secure the circulation, as that is amply secured by the bonds; and it does seem to me that the amount of the reserve to secure depositors might well and safely be in gold, silver, legal-tenders, United States bonds, or national-bank notes. These securities are all good and ample security for depositors.

While I advocate for the time being this national-bank system, and look upon it as a great system of banking, because it gives the most undoubted security to the note-holder, I hope to see the day when such a thing as a legal tender will be a thing of the past. Yet I think the system, to be perfect, should be left to the States, each knowing its wants; and if Massachusetts needs a banking capital of sixty or ninety or one hundred millions, and New York as much in proportion to its large wants, let the respective States decide this question each one for itself. In this way each State, acting for itself in view of its own needs and with perfect knowledge of them, could much better and more wisely decide this question.

In my opinion there should be no difference between legal-tenders and national-bank notes, the Government being responsible for both; and if there be any difference at all, the national-bank notes are the best, having the additional security of the stockholders.

Without being in favor of expansion, yet as we need more money in the West, and the East cannot afford to part with what they have now on hand, I advocate an additional issue, as already indicated.

The resumption of specie payment cannot be effected by merely saying "We shall on a given day resume." This must be the natural and healthy growth of a wise system. And the first great move in this direction, in my opinion, is by providing that at an early day in the future legal-tenders and national-bank notes shall be taken in payment of the duties on imports; say to the extent of 50 per cent. Our custom duties now amount to upward of $200,000,000 annually. We need to-day for the interest on our bonds about $100,000,000, and need gold for no other purpose. We could then very well receive one-half of the duties in paper money and still have enough to pay our interest. But in addition to this, if paper money was taken for duties, the difference between it and gold would soon disappear. In my opinion we shall never have steady prosperity and be able successfully to compete with our rivals in the markets of the world until specie is the basis of our entire system.

Although I hope to see the day when our paper money will be as good as gold—and I think this day would not be very distant if we did not ourselves, by our own system of legislation, create a demand for gold, thereby making it better than legal-tenders—yet, to resume speedily, or in a short time, would ruin my section, and would have the same disastrous effect upon the entire debtor class throughout the whole country. I repeat, we cannot resume by merely saying on such a day resumption will take place. This must come about in the natural order; which I think would soon be, if we diminished the demand for gold and correspondingly augmented the demand for legal-tenders and national-bank notes.

The gold is in the East. The national-bank notes were largely located there, and are held there yet. The legal-tenders are paid out there by the Government, as the largest portion of our government expenditures are made in that section. Even Indian supplies are bought in New York; and the bids for beef to feed the Indians, as well as the bacon, pork, and flour for their rations, are opened in the same city. We in the West have no gold; and, as the following figures will show, much less paper money than our legitimate needs require.

Under the law distributing money on the basis of wealth and population—

Missouri was entitled to	$15,459,409
Received and has to-day only	6,476,193
Deficiency	8,983,216
Illinois was entitled to	24,155,430
Received and has to-day only	17,824,209
Deficiency	6,331,221
Iowa was entitled to	9,711,381
Received and has to-day only	5,674,385
Deficiency	4,036,996

Here is a deficiency of very nearly $20,000,000 in these three States. Yet each State has a large population, large crops, and greatly needs capital. My State has a population of two millions. Saint Louis is a city of four hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants—the fourth in population and the third in manufactures in the Union—with varied resources greatly needing capital, and yet we have less than six and a half millions of banking capital. Therefore, to talk to us, needy and poor as we are, about early specie payments, is adding insult to injury. I am in favor of specie payment; I believe it to be the only true system; it is the system of the commercial world: but we have been placed by the legislation of our country in a position where this is impossible. As things are now my constituents would be satisfied with paper money, legal-tenders, or national bank-notes; and we would in the mean time hope and pray for the day when the old democratic hard money will again be the law of our country.

The words "inflation" and "expansion" are often used in this body, as well as by the press and by the people. While the meaning of these words is well known, nevertheless they are, I think, very incorrectly used when applied to the idea of an increased circulation. To increase the circulation to the point of the just limit required by the business of the country is neither inflation nor expansion. I have not the time to undertake to show that we have not at this moment as much capital per capita as we had before the war, or as much as there is in England or France, the other great commercial nations of the world. In addition to this, we need more money than France or England, for reasons which again time does not allow me to state. If the fact be admitted that we have not as much money as our legitimate business wants require, and without which we would suffer, is it inflation or expansion to obtain the amount we require? The Eastern States can very well say that they are opposed to inflation or expansion, because they have more money placed there by law than we have in proportion to our respective needs; they have all that their business wants require. Therefore to allow them more would be really inflation or expansion. With us, as I have already stated, it is neither. We must not forget that we are now under the complete control of an artificial and forced system, the Government having the power to make money scarce or plenty, which in my opinion is radically wrong; but while it does continue, the Government should in justice allow to us the amount we require for our business purposes. We have in Missouri six and a half million of dollars of circulation; the custom duties and the amount of internal revenue collected amount very nearly to as much. Would it be inflation or expansion to enable this great State to obtain a few millions more? Boston has near fifty millions, while we have six and a half for the whole State. Now, to give more money to Boston would really be inflation and expansion both, with a vengeance, and would be, no doubt, a serious misfortune for that city.

While I hope to see the day when this entire system will be changed, yet for the time being, and because our wants are pressing, I urge an issue of fifty millions—not for the West, but for the entire country—knowing now that the most of it will go to New York and other eastern cities; but as under the present circumstances we seek a market there for our products, it is our interest at this particular period to give them the means to buy our wheat and our corn, our pork and our flour, and our cotton. Their interest for the time being is also our interest. Then, I repeat, enforce the law of July 12, 1870, which provides that eastern banks should be curtailed to the extent of twenty-five millions and this amount given to western banks. Under the circumstances I would not ask these eastern banks to be curtailed of this sum. I am willing they should keep it, believing that they want it for legitimate business purposes; but give us this amount, which would be an increase of the amount allowed by law, instead of a change of location, as contemplated by the act of 1870.

A resumption of specie payments will never take place as long as there is a demand for not less than two hundred millions of gold annually by the Government. This amount exceeds the amount of gold in the country; therefore, as long as the Government will collect all its duties in gold a demand for gold will continue to exist; and as the demand is larger by perhaps fifty millions than the supply, gold will always be at a premium; and it is astonishing that the premium is not larger than it is to-day. To insist upon the continuance of this policy while Senators are advocating a resumption of specie payments is to me incomprehensible, and makes the impression on my mind that there is a want of sincerity; for no man can be so blind as not to see that as long as so great a demand for gold continues resumption is utterly impossible, and if it did take place it would not continue forty-eight hours. If paper money was taken in payment of duties to the extent of one-half, gold and paper money would be of equal value, and the hundred and fifty millions of gold in the country, now used as an article of merchandise and trade, would be immediately restored to its true and normal functions as a medium of exchange, and the effect would be an augmentation of one hundred and fifty millions at once to the circulation of the country.

Let all this system, however, Mr. President, be of short duration. It is not competent for this Government, or any government, to make money beyond coining metal—gold and silver; and if the Government were competent, in a country like ours—composed of different States, spreading over a continent, and extending across different latitudes, with different productions, different wants—it is impossible for the national Government to exercise wisely this power. Both as a political and a commercial question, such a power should not be in the Federal Government. The States are the proper agents to discharge this duty. Each State, knowing its wants and its needs, can do this with more wisdom and without any danger of over-issue. But owing to the fact that we have different States, extending over a continent, with varied and different productions, the necessity of uniformity in value becomes of paramount importance. While my idea is that each State should have the power to charter as many banks as they might think proper, they being the judge of the amount of money they require, I would have a law for the entire nation, requiring all the States to deposit United States bonds, as is now required by the law authorizing national banks; and as the nation is responsible for these bonds, and would have possession of them, to assume, as is now the law, the payment of the circulation. This would give uniform value to the circulation. To this general law each State would be required to conform. This would take from the Federal Government the power to control now exercised by Congress and the Secretary of the Treasury. This system of banking I would call State independence, with national security. This change, with the payment of duties to the extent of one-half in paper money for the present and after a time all in paper money, would in my opinion be all that is necessary to provide a safe banking system, based on specie payment, adequate to all the wants of all the States.

I regret very much, Mr. President, that I have been compelled to consume so much time in explaining, in my way, my views upon this truly important question. I have done so under a great sense of duty to my State and to my section. I flatter myself I have given expression to their own views on this subject. We are suffering very much, and ask for relief from Congress. We are, we think, entitled to what we ask. Permit me to hope that we be not disappointed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN obtained the floor.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Senator from New Jersey, I understand, proposes to address the Senate on the subject now before the Senate—that is, the resolution of the Committee on Finance. I trust he will give way and allow us to proceed with the salary bill. The Senator will be entitled to the floor, as a matter of course, when the pending resolution shall be taken up again.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I expect to occupy the time of the Senate but very briefly; at the same time, however, I am perfectly willing to give way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending resolution can be laid aside informally, by unanimous consent, for the purpose of taking up the salary bill. The Chair will ask if there be objection to that course?

Mr. DAVIS. A communication from the Secretary of the Senate on that subject was ordered to be printed this morning, and I should like to have it printed before the bill is considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia objects. A motion can now be made, if the Senator from Iowa sees fit to make it, to postpone the pending order, with a view to take up the salary bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the pending and all prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to consider the salary bill, so called.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think my friend from West Virginia must see the propriety of speedy action upon the subject of the salary bill. The question of finance, which has been discussed and upon which I desire a vote as soon as the Senate is ready to vote, is certainly too grave a one, and too important a one, and too many Senators desire to speak upon it, to justify the hope of a vote upon it for some time. I hope that we shall proceed now and act to-day upon the salary bill, and without much debate. All the information which my friend seeks is published, and he can get it from other public documents as well as from the one which has been ordered to be printed. If there is any point on which he desires information, he can get it from public documents already in existence. Therefore, although I dislike to vote to postpone the pending resolution reported by the Committee on Finance, I shall feel bound to vote to postpone everything until this salary bill disappears from the Senate. I hope it will be acted upon to-day.

Mr. FLANAGAN. With due respect to my distinguished friend from Ohio, I hope it will not be acted upon to-day. I wish to submit some few remarks on the subject, but I am feeble to-day and unable to do so. I got up out of a sick-bed this morning to come to the Senate. I do not myself propose to plead guilty to this great fraud, as it is charged to be broadcast throughout the land. I want to meet that charge boldly. I supported the salary bill in the first instance, and I am still determined to do so to the last; and I feel a disposition to discuss it, but I do not feel able to do so to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division ayes 23, noes 17.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 718) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

OFFICIAL SALARIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 793) to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to offer an amendment to the report of the committee, to come in after the substitute that is proposed for section 3.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am not sure but that an amendment is now pending to that same section. If that is so, I will withdraw my amendment until that one is acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment to an amendment pending, offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT,] which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. PRATT, which was to add at the end of the first section of the amendment reported by the committee the following proviso:

Provided, however, That the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-third Congress, who have received their compensation since the 4th day of March, 1873, at the rate of $7,500 per annum, in accordance with the act of March 3, 1873, shall hereafter be paid only such monthly installments as shall in the aggregate make their compensation for the whole Congress equal to the sum of $5,000 per annum.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to call the attention of my friend from Indiana to what strikes me as the effect of his amendment if it be adopted. It provides that Senators and Members of the House and Delegates, who have received the increased pay since the 3d of March last, shall be debited with the excess in settling with them for their future compensation. I have nothing to say against that proposition; but it leaves out the cases of those who have not taken the excess. No provision is made in regard to them by this amendment, and the consequence is, that if the amendment were adopted just as it is, those who have not taken the excess may go and take it. It makes a discrimination between them and those who have already received it. Now, there are members of the Senate and there are Members of the House who have not received the increased pay, who have only taken pay at the rate of $5,000; and there are some who although they may have taken a particular month's pay at the increased rate, yet have seen to it that the aggregate of all they have received does not exceed what would have been due to them had no change in the salary law been made. Now, the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana only applies to such as have actually received an excess of pay, and not to those who have not yet drawn that excess. It leaves them to draw it after this act shall pass and take effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana a question, inasmuch as he is reputed to be a very fine lawyer, and doubtless is. He is aware of the provision of the Constitution which declares that Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. When that compensation is ascertained by law and paid out of the Treasury of the United States, has this Congress any power to reclaim it or require them to pay any portion of it back?

Mr. PRATT. I suppose that we have the control of this question during the entire term of a Congress; that we could provide now that those who had received the limit of $5,000 should receive nothing further for their services during the residue of this Congress. I suppose we could dispense with the salary entirely if we thought proper. But this bill with my amendment makes the compensation precisely equal for all—$5,000 apiece.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, Mr. President, the Senator says that he supposes that we could abolish the salary entirely. That is very probably true; but that is not the question. I put the question to him whether this Congress has any power to reclaim a salary that has been paid out of the Treasury to a Member of Congress, under a law which has fixed such salary? Is there any difference between doing that directly and providing that a Senator or Member of Congress shall have his future salary reduced by debiting against it that which he has drawn before under the law? Is not that a taking back part of that which he has drawn under the law, when the Constitution expressly provides that his compensation shall be fixed by law and paid out of the Treasury of the United States? This is the compensation fixed by law, and it has been paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and you have no power to touch it any more than you have any other of his private property; and, as a lawyer, it seems to me that the Senator from Indiana will so say.

Mr. PRATT. It seems to me that that question does not arise here. It could only arise in case the whole $5,000 provided by this bill as compensation for each member of Congress had been in fact already paid, and, more than that, had been paid and an attempt was made to recall it. Such is not the case here. No one has yet been paid, under the law of March last, $5,000.

Mr. LOGAN. That is dodging the question again. I certainly do not desire to discuss this question at length. I expect I have received my portion of the odium of this law of March last. I do not say that we have not made a mistake in the eyes of the people; but because the country does not believe in the amount of salary we provided, that is no reason why reasonable men should demand of us to do that which we have no power as a Congress to do; nor do they.

I am willing to yield to the demands of the people as readily as any other man in this Chamber, when reasonable. I may not satisfy my constituents, but am willing to yield in my official capacity to their demands or their requests. But to go further than that, and beyond reason and law and the dictates of common sense, to satisfy the unreasonable demands of Senators who are playing a rôle for themselves, we are not called upon to do it. No demand has been made to go beyond our constitutional power by the people. Sir, the demand made by the people on the Congress is this—the repeal of the law of March 3, 1873.

What effect does the amendment have? It has the effect to charge every member of Congress for the next year to come with what he has already received in excess of the rate of $5,000 a year—to debit him with so much, and only allow him to draw enough hereafter to bring him down to $5,000. I suppose I should not get anything for the next three months under this, because my conscience has not prevented me from drawing my salary under the law. I guess I shall have to stay here without any money. The conscience of my friend from Indiana probably being a little more sensitive, he may not have drawn his amount, and hence he will be permitted to receive some pay. There is the distinction this amendment makes between Senators—between the consciences of Senators.

But it goes further. Here are our cabinet ministers, here are our heads of bureaus, here are all the men who are incorporated in the increased salary bill, and you provide that the members of Congress who are now here having seats shall return their pay, but everybody else may keep theirs. Is that honest? Is that what the people want? Is that what they demand? Do they mean that we shall perpetrate a fraud upon them; that we shall by clipping our own wings impose upon them and hide the increase of salary as it affects other officers? They demand no such thing.

Now, I do not claim that I am so versed in the law as my friend from Indiana; but what little law I do know suggests to me at least that we have no power to do that which he asks by his amendment. I am aware that when we decide questions here, sometimes our legal knowledge is overridden by outside pressure; sometimes our views are changed very much by the popular verdict, though the law is just as plain as it can be written, and we are willing to violate it merely to say before the country that we rushed to the rescue. I do not believe in such legislation.

But while I am up, if I may be permitted to say a word further, I believe I voted for the salary bill of last March. I voted for it conscientiously. I believed it was right; it was in accordance with the precedents that had been followed by nearly all our great men heretofore. I believe now that it was right. My constituents in all probability disagree with me, and I am willing to yield to their views instead of stickling for my own; but in yielding to their views I do not want to cheat them. They say to me that they are opposed to this salary bill and they want it repealed. Then what is it that we are to do if we believed conscientiously that the salary was right when we voted for it? We are to repeal it, not because we think it is wrong, for there is a majority of the Senate who voted for it; hence we repeal it because we are conforming to the will and the wishes of the people whom we represent. Now, if we mean to conform to the will of the people whom we represent, let us really do so honestly. How shall we do it? By repealing the law as far as we have a right to go. How far is that? We have a right to repeal all the salaries embraced in that law except the salary of the President and the judges of the Supreme Court.

Mr. FENTON. And those at the close of the term.

Mr. LOGAN. At the close of whose term?

Mr. FENTON. At the close of the term of the present incumbent of the Presidency; and as to the judges, at the close of the term of each.

Mr. LOGAN. That is to say, we may repeal the increased salary of the President when the present President goes out. I agree that it may be done; but it is not a question as to reaching away on years beyond, but what we shall do at this time to affect the salaries now. Either let them stand as they are or, wipe out the increase smooth and clean so far as we have the power to do it. If it was left to me to determine for myself, and I represented no one, I would leave them as they are; because I believe now as firmly as I did when I voted for the bill originally that they are not excessive; but inasmuch as that is not the public judgment, if you fail to comply with the demand you might as well do nothing, and this bill which has been introduced here to-day from the committee (and I have no disposition to criticise that committee) does not comply with the wishes of the people and their demands. I do not use the word in any offensive sense, but I say this bill is a deception upon its face. Why is it a deception upon its face? It proposes to repeal the salary bill so far as the members of Congress and subordinates about the two Houses are concerned.

Gentlemen come into this Senate Chamber and talk loudly and long about the people and their demands, and that they are rushing to the rescue in order to provide against the outrages which may be perpetrated upon them by Congress hereafter. Let those men who thus rush to the rescue bring forward a proposition that is in accordance with the demands of the people, and not bring forward one that is a fraud upon its face; and when I say that, as I said before, I do not mean it in an offensive sense. The bill only affects members of Congress and subordinates here. You are willing to reduce the wages of the men who wheel your documents about these rooms; you are willing to reduce your own salaries, but not the salaries of others increased by the Forty-second Congress in the different Departments here at Washington.

Mr. PRATT. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him one moment?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. PRATT. We are acting upon the bill which was sent to us from the House. That bill provides for only a single object, the reduction of the compensation of members of Congress and the Presiding Officers of the two bodies. Now, while it might be proper to legislate generally as to the salaries of other officers of the Government, heads of Departments, heads of Bureaus, &c., I suggest that that can be done in the future in a separate measure for that purpose. We are simply amending the House bill as it came to us.

Mr. LOGAN. Exactly. I agree that it can be done in the future; but future action is not what the people want. We can do all these things in the future. We can attend to the subject now before us in the future. But it is up before us, and the question is how shall we attend to it? Shall we do it in a proper manner, or in a deceptive manner?

I do not believe that the heads of Departments receive too much salary under the law of the last Congress. I do not believe that the President of the United States receives too much salary. I believe that the amount of salary he receives to-day is less in its purchasing power than the $25,000 in gold which General Washington received as President of the United States in his day. I do not believe that the present salary is too much.

I do not believe that the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court are too much, nor do I believe that the salaries of the heads of Departments are too much, nor the salaries of members of Congress; but inasmuch as we are repealing this law to satisfy the demands of the country, let us do it thoroughly, and not have any half-way business about it. That is my idea. If we undertake to satisfy a demand of the people, let us satisfy it fully. Hence I say now that I shall oppose any bill, so far as my strength is concerned, and that amounts to but very little, before this Senate that does not completely wipe out from the present time (for that is as far as we can go) the salary bill of the last session except in relation to the salaries of the President and judges of the Supreme Court; and anything less than this is a deception and a delusion. Is not that what we are asked to do?

Mr. PRATT. Why does not the Senator offer an amendment to that effect?

Mr. LOGAN. I am not managing this bill. The Senator from Indiana seems to have it in his charge; and he, being a man of the people and so much devoted to them, their interest being the most tender object of his care, it is his duty, having the management of this bill, to so provide that the people will not be deceived.

Mr. PRATT. Does not the Senator feel the same way toward the people?

Mr. LOGAN. One would think not, from the remarks the Senator made in his speech a few moments ago, telling about the amount of pay that a laborer gets, while a Congressman gets $5,000. It is true that some Congressmen get more probably than they are worth. I do not doubt that at all; but I look upon this kind of argument, that because a laborer gets three dollars a day, therefore a member of Congress must only get three dollars a day, as the merest humbuggery that ever was submitted or suggested to any Congress or any people. There is no analogy, no reason, for it. The laborer is just as good a man as the Congressman, but he does not expect the same pay, nor are his duties such as to require it, and the comparison so far as pay is concerned is not well taken. Hence I say that gentlemen who think their salaries should be so low should so frame their bill as to meet the demands of the people. I feel just as other gentlemen do in regard to the interest of the people and their good opinion, but I cannot go quite so far as some do in humbugging. I go just far enough to maintain my own self-respect and at the same time do that which I think my constituents want me to do, consistent with duty and law, and no further.

Now, sir, I desire some Senator on the committee that reported this bill to answer me this question, why the subordinates around the Halls of Congress here should have their wages reduced when the subordinates in the Treasury Department have not their wages reduced? Is there any distinction? Are the subordinates in the Departments any more sacred than the men here? They were put in the bill when it passed Congress, and all were placed upon an equality; their salaries were all increased; but these gentlemen, the defenders of the rights of people, come in here in hot haste to put every man who voted for the salary bill in a false position before the country; they come in here the first day that Congress convenes after the recess and say this thing must be done at once, that every man who voted for the bill may be condemned all over the country, and the first bill they bring before the Senate is a fraud and a deception.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend tell me what laborers in the Treasury Department had their salaries increased by the salary bill?

Mr. LOGAN. When I say "laborers" I mean men in subordinate positions. I presume their salaries were increased. That was my understanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. As the Senator has appealed to the members of the committee who reported this bill to know why this repeal of increased salaries did not apply to all, I will state again, with his permission, if I do not interrupt him, that this bill does repeal all the increases of salaries made at the last Congress, except, first, that of the President of the United States, who is protected by a constitutional provision; secondly, the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, who are protected by a constitutional provision.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Except the Chief Justice.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; in respect to one judge we could undoubtedly change the compensation; but I suppose no one would propose to make a rate of salary which would be unequal among the judges; and, thirdly, the class of officers to whom the Senator alludes. They are the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, who was raised to $5,000 from $3,500, and the heads of certain Bureaus in the Treasury and all the other Departments were raised from $3,500 to $4,000. Let me remind the Senator from Illinois of the distinction between this class of officers described in section 3 of this act and the officers receiving increased compensation under other portions of the law. This section was passed early in the session after debate, and in order to equalize their salaries on a grade with other salaries. It had no connection at all with what is commonly called the increased pay. It was a distinct measure, debated in both Houses of Congress, and passed by both Houses of Congress by a large majority, and put into the bill early, and therefore is not included in the general popular objection which has been made to the increased salary bill.

In answer to the Senator's appeal to us to give the reason why we did not include these officers in the proposed repeal, I simply say that the increased pay voted to these officers was passed by both Houses of Congress at an early period of the session, and is not in the same part of the bill, nor the same measure, nor has it ever been in popular estimation classed with the increased compensation bill. They were increased from $3,500 to $4,000 a year, and it seemed to me unwise to interfere with that increase. Indeed, it seemed to me a proper increase, and it would be very wrong now, when we are endeavoring to comply with the popular demand on another act of Congress, for us to reduce the pay of these particular officers down to the old standard. That is the reason why they were not included in this repeal.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very glad to hear the explanation of the Senator. I did not know that he was on the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. The chairman of the committee, [Mr. WRIGHT,] who has the bill in charge, is not in the Chamber at present.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very glad the explanation has been made. I used the word "laborer" probably in an improper sense; but I was speaking of the justice of the measure as applicable to these individuals. Now, if it is just to reduce the salary of the postmaster of the Senate, it is equally just to reduce the salary of the men holding corresponding positions in the different Departments, the salaries of which have been raised, and they were raised; and this talk among the people about a reduction of salaries I do insist does apply as well to the salaries in the Departments as it does to the salaries of members of Congress and the subordinate positions around the Congress of the United States. Since this bill has passed the House I have noticed the comments upon it all over the country. The complaint is, not that $6,000 is too much pay for a Congressman, but that the bill did not go far enough. Now, if we reduce the salaries of members of Congress for the purpose of economizing, let us reduce the salaries of other officers for the same purpose; and inasmuch as the Cabinet and all were included in the increase, let them all go together, and let them all be reduced alike: if you can go back in one case you can do so in the other.

As I said before, I am willing to vote, as other gentlemen propose to vote, according to the sentiments of my constituents on the reduction of salaries that we can affect. And inasmuch as we cannot affect the salaries of the President and of the judges of the Supreme Court, I am opposed to touching them in any way whatever; and I should vote against touching the salary of the President unless we could repeal it altogether. I am opposed to providing for the next President to have a less salary than the present President, as suggested by my friend from New York, [Mr. FENTON.] Why am I opposed to it? If we pay the present President a salary of $50,000, I am in favor of paying the next President the same salary; and if odium is to be attached to the measure, I will take my part of it. I will not discriminate. I am willing to pay the next man who is fortunate enough to be elected President, be he a democrat, liberal, or republican, the same amount that I pay the present President.

Mr. FENTON. It would be upon the same principle, if my friend will allow me, that we pay members of Congress $7,500 for the past period, and only $5,000 for the period in the future. We pay the present President $50,000 a year for four years. We provide in the bill which authorizes the increase that at the end of this term we will reduce it to $25,000 a year, the same as we propose to reduce the compensation of members of Congress.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg leave to differ with the Senator in reference to the principle as stated by him. He says that the principle is the same in paying the present President so much and the next one only half the amount as in this Congress paying itself $7,500 and the next Congress receiving but $5,000. There is a very great difference, and it is this: The next Congress will have the right to fix their own salary, and they may fix it at $5,000 or $7,000. The President has no such right; and the next-elected President will have no power over his salary. Congress has power over its salary and over his. There is therefore a very great distinction. Let it not be said that this increase was made for one President alone as an exception to all others.

Now, Mr. President, this is all I care to say on this subject. I merely desired to state to Senators that in deference to my constituents I am willing that the salary shall be reduced; but when it is reduced, I want the bill to run right through, and reduce all the salaries that we can touch under the Constitution of the United States that were increased by the action of the Forty-second Congress.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say a word upon the legal question suggested by my friend from Illinois, because I think if he comes to understand it perfectly he will find there is not the difficulty in this amendment of the Senator from Indiana that he supposes to exist. If the amendment be adopted, it creates no inequality whatsoever in the payment of members. They will all be paid precisely the same sum. Nor is it any violation of vested right. The amendment proposes that the excess over $5,000 provided by the act of March last, when received by members, shall be taken into account in settling with them in the future until the expiration of the year; the whole effect of which, if carried out, would be that each member of the Forty-third Congress would receive for the year the sum of $5,000. There is this thing, which I do not know whether the Senator from Indiana noticed in his amendment, that in effect it would be a reduction of the salary below what it was when the act of March last took effect, as his amendment takes no account of the mileage; and the consequence would be, that if his amendment be adopted precisely as it is, it would be a reduction. The compensation would not be $5,000 and mileage, as it was before, for the year, but would be simply $5,000.

Mr. PRATT. Let me say to my friend from Ohio that the bill reported by the committee, to which this amendment was offered, provides for a return to the old mileage, twenty cents a mile, in express terms.

Mr. THURMAN. If that would have the effect to restore that also it would be very well; but this amendment, coming in as a proviso after that, I should doubt extremely whether it did not limit the generality of the terms of the bill as reported by the committee. However, if the Senator thinks otherwise, let it be so.

But the objection that this is in violation of vested rights of members, or will produce any inequality between them, I submit to my friend from Illinois is not well taken. It does not destroy the equality between the members at all, nor does it destroy vested rights. Let us see how that is. In regard to the compensation of Senators and Representatives the Constitution provides:

> The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law and paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

There is no provision as to when it shall be paid, or how it shall be paid, except that it shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. But when we come to the compensation of the President, the Constitution reads:

> The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, &c.

And the same provision in regard to the judges of the courts:

> The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

The first difference, then, between members of Congress, whether Senators or Representatives, and the President and the judges, is that the Constitution is obligatory in respect to the President and the judges, that their compensation shall be paid at stated times; whereas there is no such provision in regard to that of Senators and Representatives.

There is then another material difference between the two, and that is, that the salary of the President and the salaries of the judges cannot be diminished during, in the case of the President, the period for which he shall have been elected, and, as to the judges, during the term they shall hold office; whereas the compensation of members of Congress may be increased or diminished during the very term of their office. We may increase our own salaries, or we may diminish them; and that being the case, as we have complete power over that subject to increase or diminish the salary, if now at this moment each member of Congress had already received precisely the sum of $5,000 for the year commencing on the 4th day of March last, I say, as the Senator from Indiana has already said, if we thought he had received enough for this year, we might say he should be paid no more than the $5,000 that he had already received. We may increase our own salary or diminish it, and we might diminish it for the succeeding three months down to a dollar a day, and no one could dispute that that would be a constitutional law, although the effect of it might be to make the whole compensation for the year just $5,000. I will suppose such a case as that. So we might say that it should be nothing for the next three months because we have already received enough.

I do not find, therefore, any constitutional difficulty in the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana; and I shall vote for it for this, if no other reason, that I feel myself bound by the instructions of my Legislature to undo, as far as it is in my power to do, the effect of the act of 3d March last.

Mr. LOGAN. Will my friend allow me right there to ask him a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. He says that the Constitution makes a distinction in providing that the President shall receive his salary at stated times, while there is no such provision in regard to the salary of members of Congress. Is that what I understood him to say?

Mr. THURMAN. I think it does, because the Constitution provides that the President shall, at stated times, receive a salary—that means payable at stated times, and we have made it payable monthly—and that shall neither be increased nor diminished during his term of office. When the President has been in office a month, and a month's salary is due him and it has been paid to him, it is just as much his own private property as if he had received it from any individual as a consideration for a sale of property. It is a wholly different case from the case of a member of Congress.

Mr. LOGAN. Where the law provides that a member of Congress shall have his salary paid monthly, and the month expires, and he receives that pay, is not that as much his private property as anything else?

Mr. THURMAN. That does not touch the question. The law provides that his salary shall be $7,500 a year.

Mr. LOGAN. Payable monthly.

Mr. THURMAN. Payable monthly. He is not employed by the month. He is to be paid $7,500 a year, and it is payable by the month; but Congress may at any time repeal that law, and then he does not get $7,500.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course Congress may do that; but the question I ask is not as to the power of Congress to repeal the law. That is not the point in controversy. I ask the Senator whether, when the individual receives the money under the law payable monthly, it does not vest in him and become his private property?

Mr. THURMAN. I will answer the question of my friend. That question would arise provided you required the member to pay it back; but the amendment of the Senator from Indiana does not require anybody to pay back.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Does not the amendment of the Senator from Indiana require that this shall be charged to the member of Congress?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes; and if the effect of charging it is to take away any right to any more compensation for that year, he will get no more; but if the excess should be more than his compensation at the rate of $5,000 a year would be for the remainder of the year, he is not required to pay back the excess.

Mr. LOGAN. On this point, because it is the point of controversy, I want the Senator—for he is a very good lawyer—to answer me this question: Has Congress any power to deprive you of your property after it is once vested in you?

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator, being a very good lawyer himself—and I say that not to bandy compliments—does not need to be told that private property cannot be taken without making just compensation, under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. The question then is, whether, if a man receives his salary, it does not become private property. Does it not? I know I cannot put questions to the Senator that he cannot answer, but I should like to know whether or not it does not become private property. If it does not, is it real estate? It is something. I should like the Senator to tell me, after he receives his salary, what kind of property it is.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly when a member has drawn his pay and got it in his pocket it is his private property, and is liable for his debts; and if he goes into bankruptcy it can be taken by the assignees.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, following that, I will ask this question: Suppose it is private property, and it is liable for his debts, by what process can Congress divest him of it, without making just compensation?

Mr. THURMAN. It does not divest him of it.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, it does. You do not divest a man of what he is to get, but of what he has got, by refusing to pay the amount due to him monthly until it is equalized to the $5,000 per annum. That is exactly what you do. Now I should like to ask the adroit Senator another question. Suppose this bill should be passed and become a law to-day, and I should resign my seat to-day, could the Government of the United States recover that money back from me or not? I should like for him to explain that.

Mr. THURMAN. I was called off, and did not hear the question.

Mr. LOGAN. Suppose this bill should become a law to-day. I have drawn several thousand dollars of my pay; I do not remember how much. The law passes to-day, and is signed by the President, requiring that money which I have drawn to be charged over on my account in future, and in that way the Government of the United States is to obtain the money back. Now, suppose I resign to-morrow, can the Government recover that money from me? That is the question I ask.

Mr. THURMAN. I am afraid the Senator will resign in order to keep his money. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. There is no danger of that; but I should like the Senator to answer me that question, inasmuch as his legal mind controls him in voting for this bill. He thinks it is legal and proper, because he has been so instructed. I should like him to answer that question, because if the Government can recover it back by this process it may do it by process before a court. I should like to know before we vote whether it can be done or not.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I do not intend to vote for this amendment of the Senator from Indiana. I have a very clear path marked out for myself on this subject. I voted against the increase of pay because I thought it was unwise, and I voted against the back pay because I thought it was wrong; and I have acted accordingly. And I have been more and more impressed every time I have thought of this question of the great lack of wisdom there was, at least in this instance, in the Constitution violating the old common law-maxim that no man should ever be made a judge in his own case; for I think it is perfectly apparent that if the idea of some constitutional commentators were carried out that each Congress is to fix its own salary, there would be very little other legislation done if we were called upon to act upon this subject at every session.

There is no such thing as compensation in this question of congressional salary. You cannot make it compensation, as I have argued heretofore. There must be equality of compensation, but there can be no compensation for services or for sacrifices. There is no equality in the labor that is performed, no equality in the responsibilities that are imposed. For instance—and I do not make the comparison with any invidious view—take the mere matter of labor: here is my friend from Nevada who sits behind me, [Mr. STEWART,] who has probably upon a liberal estimate fifty thousand constituents to call upon him in attending to their wants, and here is my neighbor across the way, from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] who has four millions to call upon him. Is there any parallel between their labors and their responsibilities? And yet their compensation must be equal.

The truth is, you have two questions to consider in fixing this compensation. The one is a question of public policy, and the other is the individual one between the member and his constituents; and the misfortune of it is, that when you come to look upon that the constituency generally look only upon the individual side of the question, and lose sight of public policy altogether. I have no hesitation in saying that if I were called upon to fix my salary on the amount of labor I have to undergo, I do not think what I have been receiving is too much; and I do not intend to pay back a dollar of what I have received since the 4th of March last. I avow that openly, although I voted against the bill.

But now I come to the question which I rose to propound both to my friend from Indiana and to my friend from Ohio, under this amendment, as I intend to vote against it. The amendment proposes equalization, as I understand it; that it proposes to take all the members of the present Congress—the Forty-third Congress—who have drawn the increased rate of compensation since the 4th of March last, and to deduct from their compensation in the future an amount which will bring them down to the $5,000 per year fixed in this bill.

Now, if equalization is the purpose, if you intend to make the salaries of the members yet under congressional control as nearly equal as possible, why not go further back? Here are a large number of Senators who were in the Forty-second Congress; there are many members of the House who were in the Forty-second Congress; and if there be any feature of the legislation of last March which was considered objectionable, it is what has been popularly baptized as the back-pay feature of the bill. If the Forty-third Congress has power to defalcate against the coming salary what has been received in the months since March last, why has it not the power to defalcate against the members who took the back pay in the Forty-second Congress? Why does the amendment of the Senator from Indiana stop there? I can understand no difference. If my friend from Ohio takes the ground that Congress has the power now to open accounts, and to defalcate against the coming salary the excess that has been received since the 4th of March last, why have we not the power to go back into the Forty-second Congress?

Mr. THURMAN. That would be a discrimination between members.

Mr. SCOTT. Between what members?

Mr. THURMAN. Between those who belonged to the Forty-second Congress and those who did not.

Mr. SCOTT. Not at all. It makes no discrimination among the present members; it reduces them all to $5,000. The only discrimination it makes is in favor of those who were in the Forty-second Congress and are not in the Forty-third. They have got the money, and you cannot reach them; but if you can reach members from the 4th of March last, you can reach every member of the Forty-third Congress who was a member of the Forty-second, and this amendment falls short of its highly patriotic purpose.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I have not risen to discuss the question of the back pay or the question of salaries. I was unfortunate enough when this proposition to increase salaries came into the Senate, toward the end of the last session, to be absent form the Senate. I am told that it came in at a very late hour of the night, when, not being well, I had gone home. I have not, therefore, risen to criticise the conduct of any gentleman who was here at that time, nor to comment on any action which occurred subsequently, nor to make any explanations or apologies for myself. In fact, I think if the public do not understand this question it is its own fault. It does not desire to do so. It cannot well be enlightened by anything that may be said upon it now, if it has heretofore sought the truth and digested it. I have risen, therefore, simply to correct an error in constitutional construction, made by my distinguished friend, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN;] an error which might be more serious, having the weight of his great ability and high authority to support it, and the evil consequences of indorsing which might be more than any result which might arise from the vote on the salary bill, no matter how it may be given. If I have misunderstood the Senator from Ohio, I shall be very glad. If I have not misunderstood him, and can suggest to him that he has omitted perhaps one view of the question which should control it, and the omission of which makes his opinion a bad precedent, I feel sure that he will most cheerfully throw the weight of his judgment on the side of the Constitution, and an honest interpretation of its every clause.

I understood the Senator from Ohio to say that he could see nothing unconstitutional, he could see no invidious distinction, in an amendment which provided that those Senators who, since the 4th of March, have been drawing pay at the rate of $7,500, should have charged up to them that sum, so that they would draw now a less sum than those who did not receive the increased pay under the salary bill. To that proposition the Senator from Ohio, impelled, as he says, by the action of his Legislature to speak on the subject, has given the weight of his authority, than which there is no greater in this Senate.

Mr. President, the Constitution says that the Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation to be ascertained by law. It must be the Senators each and all of them alike. It must be ascertained—namely, made certain as to amount. It must be by law that it is made certain; that is, by a general rule applying to all.

Mr. President, if I understand this question, a Senator of the United States, a member of the Congress of the United States, under the Constitution and the law passed thereunder, may receive the sum ascertained by law. He has no option about it. If it is nothing, he has no right to anything; if it is a larger sum than it was when his constituents elected him, he must receive that sum and no other. It is the sum "ascertained by law." Those are the words of the Constitution. That that law was unconstitutional; that that law was improper or illegal—I speak not now of motives, nor of the propriety or wisdom in its passage—but simply that it has never been claimed that there was any defect in that law by which it was not an operative law—this has never been suggested. So it has never been whispered that a Senator of the United States had a right to receive more or less than that sum. When it was received it was his own. Of course, no Senator was bound to draw it. A man may let his money that is due him pile up in the Treasury of the United States, or in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, to any amount he pleases, as he may in a bank or anywhere else. There it piles up; there it goes to his credit; it is credited to him. The day the bill became operative the amount due to each was payable; and the man who did not go to the office the day he was entitled to it and draw the sum, the average of which, it was said in this debate, was about $3,000, was just as much entitled to it as those who did; and his administrators were just as much entitled, by the laws of this land, to collect it if he died as if he had taken it during his life. That position cannot be controverted. It is impregnable.

Now, Mr. President, how would it be in case it appears that any Senator has not received this pay? No such case can exist under the law. Every member of Congress received his pay—back pay, increased pay, and all. Take the case of the gentleman who devoted the back pay, which was his legal right, to building the Washington Monument; or of the gentleman who divided among the poor of his district, kind and charitable as he was, the money so taken from the Treasury; and are they, with their charitable and generous disposition of it, embraced in the clause of this amendment, or are they excluded as those that did not take the increase? If they are included because they did with it what their good and charitable hearts suggested, nevertheless they took it. The United States Government did not make an appropriation to assist in the building of the Washington Monument. Money cannot be taken out of the Treasury to be distributed among the poor of a congressional district except by law. No, Mr. President, they took it; and a Senator who wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Senate telling him to cover the pay which was due him back into the Treasury of the United States took that money. He could only convey a title to it, because it was their property. He disposed of it where his conscience, where his means, where his disposition led him in the exercise of that right which it was his duty to exercise—where they told him it had better go; but it was nevertheless his act. It was covered into the Treasury by no law of Congress, but by the act alone and solely of that individual; and if that individual had died before he made that disposition it would have belonged to his estate, and could have been claimed by his executors. He was generous with his own, not with the public money. So that, Mr. President, whether a Senator, receiving it as all did, devoted it to pay his debts, or whether in the exercise of a noble generosity, claiming the right to do what he would with his own, he gave it for such purposes as he thought convenient and proper, or whether he did it without taking any action on the matter, still in contemplation of law this sum was to his credit; and it required his act, his conveyance, to divest himself of it; or, in case of death, the act of his representative. So it has been in every case; and in such instances, if there be such, where the voluntary disposition of it has not been made by the individual, it stands there as his property now, subject to an action in case of his death by his administrator or executor.

Now, Mr. President, in no remark that I have made have I had the slightest intention of finding the least fault with any gentleman doing as he saw fit in reference to this matter; nor do I think I have a right to do so. Being the law of the land, being the sum ascertained under the Constitution, it was a simple question for every individual in the exercise of that right which he has to make such conveyance and disposition of his property as he pleased, to do as he saw fit; and those gentlemen who saw fit to devote it to charitable purposes have, no doubt, earned the thanks of the community who were the recipients of their charity.

Whether the salary should have been increased, whether it should have been made retroactive, are not questions which arise under a proper consideration of this amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

When the propositions of the committee of the Senate, as found in their amendment to the House bill, come up, we will be called upon to act on the question of what the salary should be permanently fixed at by law. After hearing from those who have studied the subject I hope to be as clear in my mind on that subject as I am on the present.

But, Mr. President, in the mean time I hope that what I have said may induce the Senator from Ohio to so modify his expressions on this amendment that they will not conflict with the constitutional provision referred to, and with which, I think, they do conflict. We have seen that in every one the pay was received; the transfer was the individual act, and not the operation of law; and that in no sense can the amendment apply, unless, indeed, it apply to all. The power claimed to discriminate between Senators, to pay to one more and to another less, is a most dangerous and unwarranted assumption. It not only violates the constitutional provision which really, taken with the whole instrument, reads "each Senator shall receive," but it enables a partisan majority practically to deny representation in the Senate by starving the minority. Delaware and New Jersey, Rhode Island and Connecticut Senators should be paid small sums because their States are small, it may soon be said. And what becomes of that supreme and controlling clause, "Each State shall have two Senators?" We have no longer independent State representation. The equality of the States no longer exists. You might as well pay the Senators according to size of mind or body, or have an intellectual scale.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I should not say a word more on the point immediately under consideration but that I must have been extremely unfortunate in the expression of my views, or else I must be exceedingly mistaken in my view of what is the Constitution, for I find that I am criticised all around and told that I am wrong in my views. But yet, sir, I cannot see it.

In the first place, I wish to ask my friend on the right [Mr. STOCKTON] to divest himself of any idea that the back pay is involved in this amendment. This amendment has nothing to do with back pay and requires no back pay, as it is called, which was compensation paid to members of the Forty-second Congress, to be charged up.

Mr. MORTON. I will inquire of the Senator whether back pay is involved in the bill at all as it came from the committee?

Mr. THURMAN. It is not involved in the bill as it came from the committee; neither is it in the amendment of the colleague of the Senator from Indiana who has interrupted me. It is not in this controversy at all.

Mr. STOCKTON. In using the expression "back pay," I was speaking simply of the sum of money alluded to in the amendment—that is, the sum drawn at the rate of $7,500, embraced in the old salary bill. It matters not whether it be retroactive or not as far as this question is concerned. The proposition remains the same, whether it be back pay or whether it be pay paid under the present salary bill at the rate of $7,500.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to have a clear distinction drawn. What is considered back pay in popular parlance was the additional sum of $5,000, less mileage, which was paid to each one of the members of the Forty-second Congress for his services in that Congress. That was the back pay. It amounted to different sums to the different members, according to the amount of their mileage. To the Senators from Ohio it amounted to about $4,300, or between forty-three and forty-four hundred dollars. To the Senator from Oregon, who liberally contributed his share to finish the Washington Monument, it amounted to the sum of one hundred and forty-odd dollars; and so on. It was a very different sum according to the amount of mileage that a member was to receive. That is not in this bill, nor is it in the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana furthest from me, [Mr. PRATT.] But the act of March 3, 1873, provided that the salary of members of Congress should thenceforth be at the rate of $7,500 per annum, payable monthly. It made an annual salary, just as the previous act had made; an annual salary just as the act of 1856, which established $3,000, had made. So this act of March last provided that in the future the compensation of a member of Congress should be $7,500 per annum.

Now, it is agreed on all hands that that act is to be repealed, and we are to go back to $5,000 per annum; and, inasmuch as that is done in deference, as it is said, to public opinion, which condemns the act, the Senator from Indiana furthest from me proposes to give full effect to that public opinion and make it apply to this Congress just as fully as if the salary had not been raised at all quoad this Congress.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator allow a question? Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that public opinion did not bring itself to bear upon that portion of the increased compensation which was awarded to the members of the Forty-second Congress?

Mr. THURMAN. It did; and I think that was about the blackest animal that there was in the basket—the back-pay.

Mr. SCOTT. Why not include it in the amendment?

Mr. THURMAN. For a reason that my friend from Pennsylvania must perfectly understand, and which I mean to notice presently, when I come to that branch of the subject. I will do it, but I can do only one thing at a time. Now I want to go on and state what this amendment of the Senator from Indiana is. It is simply to say in effect that the pay of members of the Forty-third Congress shall be $10,000 for this Congress, and in computing their pay $10,000 you take into account what has already been paid. I put it to any one here if this amendment, read in these words: "that the compensation of members of the Forty-third Congress, for the Congress, shall be $10,000"—if that was the simple amendment and nothing more, and not a word was said about charging up to them what they have received—would not the necessary effect be that all they have received would be taken out, and they would only receive the balance of the $10,000; and is there anybody who would say that was not constitutional?

Or suppose you take it in another way and provide that the bill shall take effect from the 4th day of March next, leaving you to receive pay at $7,500 up to the 4th day of March next, and then provide that for the succeeding year your pay shall be only $2,500 a year, would anybody say that that would be unconstitutional? And yet that would be precisely the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. It would make your pay for the Congress $10,000 and no more, and his amendment makes it $10,000 and no more, and this objection is a mere objection to the form of the thing, to what is called the charging up, the debiting members with what they have received over and above the rate of $5,000 a year; and as we have power to decrease our compensation as well as to increase it, as we may do it at any time whatsoever, as we may take into consideration what we have received heretofore in determining what we shall receive in the future, I, for the life of me, cannot see, with the utmost respect for those who think otherwise, where is the difference between the proposition of the Senator from Indiana and either one of the propositions that I have suggested; for instance, the proposition that the pay of the Forty-third Congress shall be $10,000 for the Congress, or that this act shall take effect on the 4th day of March next, and the pay for the next year shall be at the rate of $2,500.

Mr. MORTON. Allow me to ask a question.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator speaks of the law as providing that a Senator's pay shall be $10,000 for the Congress. I submit to him that the law makes no reference to the Congress at all, but only provides that it shall be so much per annum.

Mr. THURMAN. I am supposing an amendment to be offered to that effect.

Mr. MORTON. I am speaking of the law as it is. It has no application to a Congress as being two years, but it speaks of the pay as being so much per annum, so that the question of one Congress or the other has nothing to do with it.

Mr. THURMAN. That is an entire mistake. We may be confused about time here, and that has confused the minds of Senators. They have looked upon the time that has elapsed since the 3d day of March as the time when they have been performing service and earned money, and that, therefore, the money is money that has become their private property by virtue of services actually rendered, when the truth of it is that for nine months of that time they were not here at all, and were rendering no service whatever, except some few who may have been on committees. The Transportation Committee, I believe, was transporting itself back and forth. I do not know anybody else that rendered service.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senate was in session last March.

Mr. THURMAN. Take that out and it leaves eight months. I do not find fault with the payment that was made for that time, because we were liable to be called together at any moment. It does not matter much whether it was paid then or paid all in a lump after we came here. The whole of that is modus, but that has confused the minds of Senators in considering this subject, and they have looked on the monthly installments they have received as pay for services actually rendered; whereas that is not the fact at all. It is simply a mode of convenience. The United States say to each of us, "We will pay you so much, and we will pay you so much in advance of the service you render." That is no extraordinary thing, even as between private individuals: "We will pay you so much a year, and you shall have so much of it in advance of the time you render the service." There is nothing illegal, nothing unreasonable, in that.

Very well, then, Mr. President. Inasmuch as you might plainly provide that this law should take effect on the 4th day of March next, and that then for the next succeeding year we should receive only $2,500 a year, or inasmuch as you might provide that the compensation of members for the two years ending the 3d of March, 1875, should be $10,000, and that would leave you to be charged up with all you had received before this time, so you may take it in the form in which it is expressed in the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Now a word as to the back pay. The Senator from Pennsylvania says, why may you not charge up the back pay? For this reason: that that would make an inequality in the pay of members of Congress, paying some men one salary and others another and different salary. I do not go into the question whether or not there must be equality; whether there must be uniformity. I know that there are some persons who think there need not be uniformity.

Mr. CRAGIN. Will the Senator allow me a suggestion? I understand him to say that that would make the salary unequal. There are a portion of the members of Congress who have not taken this back pay, and the suggestion is that those who have should be embraced in this amendment. Would not that make it equal?

Mr. THURMAN. No; I will show the Senator that it would make it unequal. Here is the inequality: it makes an inequality between the members of the Forty-third Congress who were members of the Forty-second Congress and the members of the Forty-third Congress who were not members of the Forty-second Congress.

Mr. SCOTT. Would it not equalize it among those who are left?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes; but that would make the salaries very different for the Forty-third Congress. That is as plain as anything can possibly be.

Mr. BAYARD. If it will not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. THURMAN. Whenever, Mr. President, a Senator is endeavoring to make a legal argument, it is so charming to be interrupted just at the thread of it that I never object. I did not say that at all in any temper. I hope my friend from Delaware will proceed.

Mr. BAYARD. Go on, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. I was trying to get through what I have to say and wanted to answer this point about the back pay.

I said that there are some persons who think that it would be competent to make a law that would provide unequal salaries for members of Congress. I heard a very distinguished member of the House of Representatives, a man who was chief justice of his State for many years, insist upon it that a law which provided that members of Congress who had been ten years in service should receive more than those who had been members for less than ten years would be a perfectly constitutional law. I do not think that is the meaning of the Constitution. I think it means that the compensation of members shall be equal; and inasmuch as providing for refunding this back pay would produce inequality between members of the Forty-third Congress who were not members of the Forty-second Congress and those who were members of the Forty-second, the Senator will at once see that his proposition is obnoxious to that objection.

And now I hope my friend from Delaware will ask me the question he rose to ask, and not take it at all hard that I declined to be interrupted at the moment.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I am unable to appreciate the justice of the proposed amendment, nor do I quite understand the constitutional difficulty in going further with this principle of equalization. There may be something in the Constitution that denies to Congress the power to make discrimination between members, but I have not been able to find it.

Mr. THURMAN. I can explain that if the Senator will allow me. When the term of service of a member of the Forty-second Congress ended he became a private citizen. Has the Forty-third Congress any right then to regulate after the expiration of the Forty-second Congress what members of that Congress shall receive? Certainly not; and you cannot take that money which he had received for services already rendered—it becomes his private property—and confiscate it without compensation.

Mr. STEWART. Most clearly not; but you can make a law operating in futuro making that discrimination, provided it is not unconstitutional to make a discrimination. Is there anything in the Constitution requiring that the pay of members of Congress shall be uniform? The Constitution provides, in cases where it was not intended that there should be discrimination, in several instances for uniform laws; such as that there shall be a uniform system of bankruptcy and uniform laws of naturalization. There are several instances where it forbids the idea of discrimination.

The matter is sprung on me; but it seems to me that it is not by any means so clear that Congress has not the power to make discrimination in this respect. But if Congress has not the power to discriminate, then I do not understand the position of the Senator from Ohio, that to do what is suggested by several would be unequal. I think the amendment here does involve that question of discrimination. I am inclined to think Congress has the power to discriminate; but if Congress has not the power to discriminate, this amendment is clearly unconstitutional in my judgment. The law has provided that members should have so much a year, and it is payable monthly. Then when the month has passed, and the money is drawn at the end of each month, it becomes private property; and in fixing the salary for the future, what has been already received cannot be taken from the member or withheld from him, or if it is he will not get as much as another member, and that is discrimination.

Is or is not the money that has already been drawn under the law the private property of the Senator drawing it? Does it belong to him, or does it belong to the United States? Have members drawn it according to law? If they have not drawn it according to law, there might be something in the suggestion; but they have no right to draw otherwise than by law. Now, if they have drawn according to law, it is private property. You say that you will equalize the members; that you will deduct from the salary of Senators a certain amount. For what reason? Because they have drawn this money. They had a right to draw it under the law, and it has become their private property. Then you will sequester so much of this private property already drawn as will equalize the salary and bring it down to the average of $5,000 a year. If it be true that they have drawn it according to law and it is theirs now, and you do not pay them as much hereafter as you do certain other Senators for certain reasons—no matter what the reasons—you make a discrimination. I cannot see what the difference is. If a law hereafter is passed whereby I receive but $4,000 and my neighbor receives $5,000, I do not care what the reason is, it is a discrimination, unless it proceeds on the theory that the money I have in my pocket does not belong to me, but belongs to the Government of the United States. If that be true, then I can understand the position; but if it be true that the money which has been already drawn belongs to the member who has drawn it, then you do not pay him as much as you do the other member, and a discrimination is made.
